PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE 99th CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Thursday, January 31, 1985

The House met at 11 a.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Help us, O gracious God, to gain hearts of appreciation for blessings received, for the beauty and glory of Your world and the wonders of the universe, for our good traditions that continue to point the way, and for friends and family who surround us with their love. May not the dangers of the world or the anxieties that cause pain ever keep us from the joy and thanksgiving of knowing that Your love is ever with us, Your gracious spirit accompanies us and Your peace is with us wherever we may go. Bless us this day and every day. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

HOUR OF MEETING ON WEDNESDAY NEXT

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns on Monday, February 4, 1985, it adjourn to meet at 2 p.m. on Wednesday, February 6.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

AUTHORIZING THE SPEAKER TO DECLARE RECESSES ON WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1985

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it may be in order at any time on Wednesday, February 20, 1985, for the Speaker to declare recesses, subject to the call of the Chair, for the purpose of receiving in joint meeting the Prime Minister of Great Britain, the Right Honorable Margaret Thatcher.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

THE FEDERAL SUPPLEMENTAL COMPENSATION BILL

(Mr. PEASE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PEASE. Mr. Speaker, today my colleagues, Mr. STARK and Ms. KAPTUR, are joining me in introducing legislation which would continue the Federal Supplemental Compensation Program for 18 more months. The program is currently scheduled to expire the week of March 31, 1985. Unless Congress takes action by that date, the only source of unemployment insurance benefits for many long-term unemployed workers will disappear.

While we are all pleased at the overall progress registered by the economy in recent months, we should not lose sight of the fact that there are still over 8 million jobless people in this country. Many States have jobless rates that are several points higher than the national average, and there are still pockets within States with near-depression level joblessness. In my own State of Ohio, for example, almost half of the counties still suffer with double-digit unemployment.

We believe that extension of the Federal Supplemental Compensation Program is necessary to ensure the continued availability of longer term benefits for those workers all across the country who are still subject to periodic spells of long-term unemployment.

It is my hope that Congress would be willing to go several steps further and undertake a comprehensive reform of the entire Federal-State unemployment compensation system. I think it is important that we start now to develop a system that is simpler, more dependable, and more responsive to the areas where the need is greatest. Next week, I plan to reintroduce the bill which Mr. STARK, Ms. KAPTUR, and I sponsored in the last Congress which I think can lead us to a better unemployment system—one that will bring stability, fairness, and common sense to this important area.

We should seize the opportunity afforded us by the current stable economic situation to safeguard our unemployment insurance safety net from any economic eventuality we might face.

DEFICIT REDUCTION SURTAX

(Mr. SCHULZE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. SCHULZE. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to help reduce the Federal deficits our Nation will face over the next several years. It is crucial that we put reality before rhetoric and come to grips with our deficit problems now. We simply must stop spending more than we bring in.

If, after a sincere effort has been made by Congress to cut Federal spending, we find that our goals have not been reached, we should seriously consider my proposal. It provides for a temporary 1-percent surtax on individual gross income and on firms reporting gross sales of $1 billion or more.

Over the 3-year life of the legislation it would provide revenues of $145 billion which would be placed in a trust fund dedicated to deficit reduction.

Equity is the goal. It fairly assesses each individual no matter what his economic level and spreads the burden across the more successful portion of corporate America.

This legislation, in conjunction with reduced Federal spending, can make real progress toward solving the remaining major problem to sustained growth in this country—the Federal deficit.

I urge my colleagues to consider this approach to deficit reduction.

THE PRESIDENT WHO CAME IN FROM THE COLD

(Mr. WEAVER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, President Reagan's luck has broken. On Inauguration Day, he was the President who came in from the cold. Now his assistant, Ed Meese, may not be confirmed for Attorney General. His attempts at deficit cutting are in shambles. With the stock market soaring with euphoria—just as it did in 1929—the economy still looks like roses. But an ominous undercurrent belies that: Our farmers are in despair and near bankruptcy; timber, steel, mining, textiles, and other basic industries are in depression already. The gargantuan trade deficit and the inflated dollar are warning of a crash to come.

Unfortunately, if the President's luck fails, the rest of us will suffer. So I wish him—and us—good luck. But he cannot rest on his luck anymore. We need action. Instead, we see our leader shrugging his shoulders as his administration falters.

ANOTHER ICE JAM—THIS ONE IN THE INTERSTATE COST ESTIMATE PROGRAM

(Mr. GEKAS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, the ice on the roads and streets outside will thaw in good time. I hope that that will be true of another "ICE"—the ICE Program, the Interstate Cost Estimate Program on which the highway projects of our Nation depend. That ICE Program, when Congress authorizes it, will release several billions of dollars across the United States for much-needed road work and to keep the economy pumping.

Yet there are a few Members of the House and of the Senate—just a handful—who are holding up the release of these funds for special demonstration projects and other pet projects. That is unfair to the American public, unfair to the other Members of Congress, and can deal a serious blow to the continuing upsurge in the economy.

I urge the Speaker of the House himself and other leaders to make sure that the ICE Program comes before our body as soon as possible so we can break the ICE jam and allow these funds to flow across the land so that the economy can stay on its upward swing.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL MONDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1985

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at noon on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

A BILL TO EXPEDITE CITIZENSHIP FOR LI CUNXIN, BALLET ARTISTE

(Mr. ANDREWS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a private relief bill for Li Cunxin, a principal dancer for the Houston Ballet and one of the Nation's greatest ballet talents. As a member of the congressional arts caucus, I recognize this bill to be of critical importance to the American arts community. Li has been invited to compete against the Soviets in June in a rare, worldwide ballet competition to be held in Moscow. There, he stands an excellent chance to win the gold medal for the United States in a discipline long dominated by the Russians. Unfortunately, if Li is not an official U.S. citizen when he competes, he may be disqualified by the Soviet judges. Li has been granted permanent resident status by the INS but will not be eligible to apply for citizenship before June.

Senator LLOYD BENTSEN is leading this effort in the Senate to expedite Li's citizenship process. It is my hope that working together we can carry the gold for the United States in Moscow this June. I urge my colleagues to join me in this important project.

TWO-THIRDS VOTE TO INCREASE STATUTORY LIMIT ON PUBLIC DEBT

(Mr. DREIER of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Speaker, based on the recommendation of newspaper publisher Al Totter, I am reintroducing a resolution to require a two-thirds vote on any legislation which increases the statutory limit on the public debt.

The need for such a resolution is obvious. Since 1980, this Congress has voted 10 times to increase the debt ceiling. Despite the hand-wringing that accompanies each new motion to raise the limit, the fact is Congress has not done much to curb spending or to stop the shocking escalation of the national debt. That debt now stands in excess of $1.8 trillion. Interest payments alone which have become the fastest growing category in the Federal budget will consume $116 billion this fisal year.

With an elastic debt ceiling, this Congress will never face up to the fact that there are limits on how we spend the hard-earned tax dollars of the American people.

By adopting my resolution, this Congress will remove the temptation to simply raise the debt ceiling and put off hard choices about establishing our spending priorities. It is time for Congress to take the first step toward fiscal responsibility, and my resolution is an appropriate place to start. I urge my colleagues to join in sponsoring this important resolution.

CONFIRMATION OF EDWIN MEESE III AS ATTORNEY GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES

(Mr. KOLTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. KOLTER. Mr. Speaker, serious questions have been raised concerning a nominee to the highest law enforcement office in the land. Allegations have been made regarding political favoritism and financial gain. These charges, as of yet, have never been answered satisfactorily.

It appears that Mr. Meese knows well the opportunities of political advantage.

Questions have been raised regarding his failure to include in his financial disclosure statements a $15,000 loan to Edwin Thomas and the subsequent Federal appointments obtained by several members and friends of the Thomas family.

Inquiries have been made about Mr. Meese's obtaining special treatment from Government agencies for business in which he had a financial interest.

And of course, there was the much publicized status change from retired Army Reserve to the Active Reserve and his later military promotion. Could this action be related to the subsequent nomination of Gen. William Berkman to a second 4-year term as Chief, Army Reserve?

My point is not that Mr. Meese should be perfect. My point is based solely on the fact that our judicial system should be above reproach and the character of the Attorney General above suspicion.

It is for this reason that I join many of my colleagues in voicing my opposition to the confirmation of Edwin Meese III as Attorney General of the United States.

HUMANITARIAN EFFORTS BY THE GOVERNMENT OF THAILAND

(Mr. McCOLLUM asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. McCOLLUM. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to applaud the humanitarian response by the Government of Thailand to the continued aggression by the Vietnamese in Cambodia particularly the shelling of Khmer civilians living in the border area. The Thai Government has thus far removed from the line of fire almost 200,000 Khmer and offered them sanctuary within Thailand. Their humanitarian efforts have saved the lives of thousands of displaced Khmer and Vietnamese. The Government of Thailand has acted in a remarkably efficient manner in conjunction with the United Nations in this important undertaking. In almost all instances the Thais, at grave risk to their own safety, have done the impossible to save these innocent men, women, and children. By all accounts the Thais have done a remarkable job not only by protecting these civilians but by offering them a place of refuge away from the horror of the Vietnamese invasion. This intolerable situation is just another instance of Soviet instigated aggression through their Asian puppet, Vietnam. The United States has done too little to support the Thai Government. The least we can do is acknowledge their heroic efforts.

TAXPAYER RELIEF ACT

(Mr. ROEMER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Speaker, we need more Members of Congress to join us in cosponsoring H.R. 600, a bill which repeals the provision of the Tax Code which establishes contemporaneous records of the accounting standards for legitimate business deductions.

We have more than 125 cosponsors thus far. We need more.

Everyone agrees that the original IRS interpretation of this provision was too harsh. We now hope that everyone can agree that the IRS's new revisions are still too burdensome. The new regulations contain complicated thresholds, actually reduce compliance and continue the unneeded insistence on contemporaneous accounting.

We cannot compromise with the IRS on this issue. We need repeal.

Cosponsor H.R. 600. Otherwise you are supporting a cure that is worse than the disease.

SECRECY SURROUNDING NASA'S LATEST SPACE FLIGHT

(Mr. MRAZEK asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MRAZEK. Mr. Speaker, the recent launch of America's first designated military-use flight of the space shuttle represented to many of us the end of NASA's age of innocence.

The secrecy surrounding the mission was unprecedented in the history of our Nation's Manned Space Program. The cloak-and-dagger air to the entire adventure brought to mind the Soviet Space Program, where secrecy has always been the norm.

Of course, anyone with a fleeting knowledge of the U.S. Space Program is aware that Discovery's latest flight hardly constituted the dawn of the military's involvement in the high frontier. In fact, the Pentagon's interest in space predates even the formation of NASA as our lead agency for space exploration, and most of our early astronauts were retrained fighter pilots.

Nonetheless, there was something quite sad about the shroud of secrecy which surrounded the shuttle's latest flight. Ours is an open society, by and large, and some of us in this body literally grew up with Walter Cronkite's exhaustive chronicling of our species' first attempts to escape our earthly bounds.

In the coming years, humankind will decide whether the heavens are to be the next giant step in our evolution, or merely a surreptitious orbital extension of an insane arms race.

THE SEATING OF RICHARD D. McINTYRE OF INDIANA

(Mr. FRENZEL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, this is January 31. It is now exactly 4 weeks since the House refused to seat the duly elected and certificated winner in Indiana's Eighth Congressional District, Mr. McIntyre.

I read today from the Evansville Press editorial signed by Mr. Dale McConnaughay of Thursday, January 24. He says, and I quote:

> The danger now is one of cynicism. As this fiasco is prolonged the residents feel ever more alienated from and distrustful of the means by which "democratic" decisions are arrrived at, their confidence in the system becomes shaken, as it already has been.

We expect the recount to be completed tomorrow and I hope the House will have a chance to undo its error and seat Mr. McIntyre next week.

REPUBLICAN MONITORS IN BLACK POLLING PLACES IN MARYLAND

(Mr. MITCHELL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, on election day in my district in Baltimore I was very, very dismayed by what was a terribly appalling pattern of behavior. The Republican Party had established monitors in all of the polling places in which there were heavy concentrations of black voters. I toured all the district and in the white areas there were not the monitors; in the black area there were.

There were some private off-duty policemen, security policemen who marched in and out of the polling places where blacks were concentrated.

I almost got arrested that day because of the arrogant behavior of some of those Republican monitors who really sought to intimidate black folks to try to prevent them from voting.

Now we look at the election in Indiana and I discover that of the 4,000 votes that have been disallowed, the bulk of those disallowances are concentrated in the black communities of that district.

It makes me wonder, was there a definite pattern to discourage black voters? As I understand it legal action will be instituted by certain black groups and their friends in that district because they are assuming that their basic right to vote has been denied by the untoward behavior of some who have really raped and vitiated the electoral process in the district in which Mr. McIntyre wants to be seated. I would suggest that he not be seated until such time as we look at more carefully what appears to be a pattern of political skullduggery against blacks in that district.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

MISSING CHILDREN

(Mr. COATS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. COATS. Mr. Speaker, this week photographs of missing children will begin appearing on milk cartons in northeast Indiana. The pictures along with information about the children and a toll-free telephone number to be used by anyone who may have seen the missing youths will appear on cartons distributed by Allen Dairy Products, Inc. I commend this project which is designed to help find missing children and to raise public awareness about missing children.

As part of the national effort to locate missing children initiated by the National Children's Safety Council five milk carton manufacturers have lent their support. The result will put photos of missing children on 1.5 to 2 billion milk cartons each year. For my own northeast Indiana district, this means that photos of four missing children will appear on milk cartons each month on the shelves of Rogers Market, Kroger, and Scott's Food Stores, among others. The space on the milk cartons is being donated by the dairies and groceries participating in this project. I am proud of the efforts of the National Children's Safety Council, the dairies and groceries as well as the milk carton manufacturers for helping locate missing children. It is a tragedy that we as a nation must not tolerate.

Approximately 1.8 million children are missing from their homes each year. Many of these children are never returned home. The problems and sometimes tragic consequences surrounding the plight of missing children is a real concern that deserves attention.

If these efforts help to locate even one child or through increased public awareness prevent this tragedy from occurring they will indeed not have been in vain.

IF YOU REPEAT AN UNTRUTH OFTEN ENOUGH SOME WILL COME TO BELIEVE THAT IT IS TRUE

(Mr. WEISS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, having heard the gentleman from Minnesota talk about the suggested stealing of a Republican seat in Indiana, I rise to speak about that because it has been clearly demonstrated in the past that if an untruth is repeated often enough some people will come to believe that it is true.

What is really going on in Indiana is an effort, if you will by the Republican Party in that State to undermine the democratic electoral process and possibly to steal a Democratic seat.

If you examine what has gone on since the November elections you will see that there has been selective determinations by a Republican secretary of state to certify the results at whatever moments during a count or recount the Republican candidate appeared to be leading while refusing to so certify when the Democrat was ahead, that different and inconsistent ground rules have been used by the Republicans in various counties in qualifying and disqualifying votes, all in an effort (a) to seat a Republican who is not entitled to be seated; and (b) to suggest improperly and unfairly that the Democrats are trying to take advantage when in fact it is the Republicans who are attempting to abuse the process.

It is a shameful effort which this House cannot allow to succeed.

I am surprised and distressed that our Republican colleagues in this body would lend themselves to support such unprincipled conduct.

I thank the Speaker.

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE HONORABLE GILLIS W. LONG

(Mr. PEPPER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I had the sad honor to attend the funeral services for our cherished colleague, Representative Gillis Long in Alexandria, LA, and to make some remarks on that occasion.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the remarks that I made on that occasion in tribute to Mr. Long be included in the official tribute delivered here on the floor of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, my eulogy follows:

We have come here on this sad occasion to pay our final tribute to this great and beloved colleague and friend and to pour out the utmost expressions of our sympathy to his bereaved family including the sorrowing people of the 8th Congressional District fortunate enough to have this great and talented representative in the Congress of the United States. We especially extend our warmest condolence to the dear wife whom Gillis leaves behind. For 37 years Kathy and Gillis walked hand in hand and heart in heart across the mountains and the valleys and though the vineyards of life together. Those of us who have lost our own beloved will know the moments of loneliness that lie ahead. As it has been said, "There are times when she will sigh for the touch of a vanished hand and the sound of a voice that is still."

Gillis was the Ranking Member on the Democratic side of the Rules Committee which I have the honor and privilege to chair. He was a tower of strength on that committee, filled with the knowledge of parliamentary procedure, remarkably capable of handling delicate and intricate parliamentary problems and situations—a man whose zeal went to the service of the democratic parliamentary process. Every member of the Rules Committee was proud of sitting there with Gillis Long—so knowledgeable, so dedicated, so concerned about making ever more effective and perfect the democratic process to the service of the people.

Gillis was not only a doer, but he was a thinker, remarkably well informed about matters pertaining to the government. Gillis told me sometime last year that the year before he read 62 books—I think rather a record for busy Members of Congress. In the last four years he was a guiding light and leader in the protection of the rules of our House of Representatives, making the democratic process work more effectively, making us more able representatives of our people, making our democracy work better. The House of Representatives would not be the effective instrument of democracy it is without the knowledge, the skill and the genius of Gillis Long.

And then Gillis Long was a man of political genius, naturally adapted to public life who proudly said, "I am proud to be a Member of the Congress of the United States, I am proud to be a politician". Gillis regarded the prerogatives and the power of his great office as an instrument through which he could better serve his God and his fellowman. He was frequently quoting passages from the Bible that indicated his respect and esteen for the elderly. He said, "Old wood to burn, old wine to drink, old authors to read and old friends to trust". Gillis Long had ever a helping hand held out to those who needed assistance whether they were young, frail or having some other requirement for aid. Gillis Long burned with concern for his fellowman, and he used his great power, which was extraordinary, in their service.

When Anthony came upon the body of his fallen foe Brutus lying dead on the floor of his tent after Philippi, he stood and gazed down upon this man and soliloquized in words that I think most appropriate to describe Gillis Long: "His life was gentle and the elements so mixed in him that nature might stand up and say for all the world, 'this was a man' ".

HOW A BILL BECOMES A LAW

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ATKINS). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, those of us in Congress are so close to the legislative process that we sometimes forget that the way in which a bill becomes law is not clearly understood by many of our fellow Americans. I receive inquiries from time to time about this question. I have prepared a brief summary of the process in the hope it may be useful to anyone who is interested in the machinery of government.

HOW A BILL BECOMES LAW

Ours is a Government of the people, by the people, for the people. It is not a pure democracy. It is a republic in a democracy. It is a representative democracy.

Our laws are the embodiment of the wishes and wants, the ideas and ideals of the American people as expressed through their Representatives in the Congress: 435 in the House of Representatives and 100 in the Senate. Any Member of the House or Senate may introduce a bill embodying a proposed law or revision of existing laws, at any time when his respective House is in session. When introduced, the bill will be entered in the Journal of the House and the title and sponsors of it printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that day.

EACH BILL NUMBERED

Each bill introduced is assigned a number by the clerk of each House and referred to the committee having jurisdiction over the subject matter by the presiding officer, that is, the Speaker of the House or the President of the Senate. Copies of the bill are printed by the Government Printing Office and made publicly available from the congressional document rooms.

Acting through its chairman, the committee decides whether a bill should be taken up by the full committee or referred to a subcommittee for its initial consideration.

THE DELIBERATIVE STAGE

The committee's deliberations are the most important stage of the legislative process. It is here that detailed study of the proposed legislation is made and where people are given the right to present their views in public hearings. When the chairman has set a date for public hearings it is generally announced by publication in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Copies of the bill under consideration by the committee are customarily sent to the executive departments or agencies concerned with the subject matter for their official views to be presented in writing or by oral testimony before the committee. The number of witnesses, pro and con, heard by the committee is largely dictated by the importance of the proposed legislation and degree of public interest in it.

TESTIMONY HEARD

The transcript of the testimony taken is available for inspection in the individual committee offices. Quite frequently, dependent on the importance of the subject matter, the committee hearings on a bill are printed and copies made available to the public.

After conclusion of the hearings the committee proceeds to meet in executive sessions—sometimes referred to as "markup" sessions—to discuss the bill in detail and to consider such amendments as any member of the committee may wish to offer. Each committee has its own rules of procedure but they generally conform to the rules of the House itself.

THE COMMITTEE VOTE

By a formal vote of the committee, it decides whether to report favorably to the House the bill with or without committee amendments. A committee report must accompany the bill, setting forth the nature of the bill and reasons for the committee's recommended approval. The report sets forth specifically the committee amendments and, in compliance with the rules of each House, indicates all changes the bill would make in existing law. Any committee member, individually or jointly, may file additional, supplemental or minority views to accompany the majority committee report. The committee report, accompanying the bill, is viewed by the courts and the administrative agencies as the most important document as to the intent of the Congress in the proposed legislation.

AFTER REPORTING

When a bill is reported by the committee it is placed on the appropriate calendar. The majority leadership decides how and when the bill will be considered on the floor. In general the bill is allowed to remain on the calendar for several days to enable members to become acquainted with its provisions.

In both the House and the Senate innumerable measures of relatively minor importance are disposed of by unanimous consent. In the Senate, where debate is unlimited, major bills are brought up on motion of the majority leader and in the House are called up under a privileged resolution reported from the Rules Committee which fixes the limits of debate and whether amendments may be offered from the floor. The Rules Committee resolution is called a rule for consideration of a bill; a closed rule if no amendments are allowed, as is generally the case in tax bills, and an open rule if amendments can be offered.

REACHING CONSENSUS

While there are distant differences between the House and Senate procedures, in general a bill is debated at length with the proponents and opponents presenting their views to acquaint the membership, as well as the general public, with the issues involved, and all with a view to arriving at the consensus. Amendments are frequently offered to make the measure more in conformity with the judgment of the majority. In the course of consideration of the bill there are various parliamentary motions, in both the House and the Senate, which may be offered to determine the sentiment of the members with respect to the pending legislation. The measure may be postponed to some future date or referred back to the committee which reported it.

With the conclusion of general debate and the reading of the bill for amendments, the question becomes whether the House or Senate, as the case may be, will pass the bill in its final form. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the day the bill was under consideration will set forth the verbatim debate on the bill and the disposition made of such amendments as were offered.

AFTER PASSAGE

With the passage of a bill by either body it is messaged to the other with the request that they concur. If no action has been taken on the like measure by the body receiving the message the bill is usually referred to the appropriate committee of that body for consideration. Hearings are again held and the bill reported for floor action. On relatively minor or noncontroversial matters the Senate or the House accepts the measure as messaged to it by the other body.

If there are substantial differences between the House and Senate versions of a given bill, the measure is sent to a conference committee which is appointed by the Speaker and the President of the Senate from the ranking committee members of each body having original jurisdiction over the bill. The object of the conference committee is to adjust the differences between the two bodies, and to report back to each its agreement. The report of the conference committee must be in writing and signed by those agreeing thereto and must have the signature of the majority of the conferees of each House.

CONFERENCE REPORT

The report of the conference committee cannot be amended and must be accepted or rejected by each House as it stands. If either House finds itself unable to accept the conference committee report a further conference is usually requested.

When the bill has been agreed to in identical form by both bodies a copy of the bill is enrolled, signed by the Speaker and by the President of the Senate, for presentation to the President. The bill becomes law with the President's signature of approval, or it may become law without his signature if he does not return it, with his objections, to the Congress within 10 days of its presentation to him.

If the President should return the bill, with his objections, to the originating body of the Congress, his veto may be overriden by two-thirds of both the House and Senate respectively voting to have the measure become law the President's objections to the contrary notwithstanding. Both the President's veto message and a record of the vote of the individual Members in the motion to override are required by the Constitution and set forth in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.●

FAIR DEBT COLLECTION PRACTICES ACT: MAKING A GOOD INDUSTRY EVEN BETTER

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, H.R. 237 is a bill to amend the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act to provide that any attorney who collects debts on behalf of a client shall be subject to the provisions of the act. As the act stands, attorneys and their employees can engage in debt collection practices which are illegal for nonattorney collectors. Some attorneys persist in conduct prohibited if undertaken by nonattorneys, including calls at unusual hours, disclosure of consumer's debt to third parties, harassment, and calls to consumers' employers. We must put an end to this gross injustice. The rules governing debt collection practices ought to apply evenly to all debt collectors, whether the collector is an attorney or not.

When the act was passed in 1977 attorneys only rarely engaged in debt collection when incidental to other business of their clients. Today, however, there are hundreds of attorney debt collection firms identical to their conventional counterparts with the sole exception that they were formed by attorneys, and are, therefore, exempt from the provisions of the act. While they may be legal law firms, they are in fact, unbridled debt collection agencies. For example, one firm has 750 employees, of which only 85 are attorneys. The vast majority—the so-called account representatives—are employed full time for the sole purpose of collecting debts. Furthermore, considering the ratio of attorneys to account representatives the persons collecting the debts receive little or no supervision by attorneys.

Many of these after-hours debt collection firms even advertise their exemption, boasting that they are more effective in returning a creditor's money than are those agencies limited under the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act. Obviously, this situation is unfair to all the many thousands of honest debt collectors who diligently comply with the act's requirements. It is not only unfair, but damaging to the industry as a whole which has improved its practices and image since the passage of the act.

H.R. 237 has received uncompromised support from a vast majority of the ethical organizations in the debt collection industry. Among these organizations are the American Collectors Association, the Associated Credit Bureau, and several of the larger law firms specializing in debt collection. These organizations recognize the benefit the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act has been for American consumers and the collection industry as a whole. And, they recognize that H.R. 237 will further protect the entire collection industry from the reputations of a small but damaging percentage of attorney debt collection firms engaging in unscrupulous practices.

I invite the Congress to help make a good industry even better by passing H.R. 237.●

WATER RESOURCES PROJECTS AUTHORIZATIONS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BATEMAN] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. BATEMAN. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing bills to authorize two important water resources projects in my congressional district. These projects have been under consideration for several years, but have not been authorized due to the deadlock between Congress and the last two administrations over how to fund water resources development projects.

The first bill would authorize the deepening of the channels in the Port of Hampton Roads, and the second would authorize the construction of a shoreline erosion control structure on Tangier Island, a small island in the Chesapeake Bay. The projects authorized by both of these bills received House approval in the last Congress, and both are included in H.R. 6, the omnibus water resources development bill, introduced by the Public Works Committee leadership in this Congress.

The deepening of the Hampton Roads channels from 45 to 55 feet has been in the design and planning stage for 15 years, and construction could begin almost immediately after Congress approves project authorization and funding.

Hampton Roads is by far the largest coal exporting center in the United States, accounting for about 47 percent of our annual coal exports, and the port's channels need to be deepened, if the United States is going to increase, or even maintain, its share of the world coal export market.

The average size of the colliers in the export trade has increased from 15,000 tons in the midsixties to 60,000 today, and is expected to increase to 100,000 tons in the next few years. This increase in the size has resulted in significant shipping cost savings, but also limits the ability of ports with shallow depths to compete in the world market. Therefore, without major port improvements, the United States will be placed at an ever-increasing competitive disadvantage in the world coal markets.

For 8 years now Congress has failed to enact legislation to provide either the authority or a funding mechanism for these much-needed port improvements and this impasse has already caused us to miss a valuable opportunity to expand our exports during the world coal shortage of 1980–81. We must break this legislative deadlock in order to insure that we do not miss any future opportunities.

The erosion control structure on Tangier Island has been under consideration since 1978 when it became clear that serious shoreline erosion on the island would soon threaten inhabited areas. The Commonwealth of Virginia joined with the Army Corps of Engineers to design a structure to stop the shoreline erosion on the island, and this project was first approved by the House in the Water Resources Act of 1979, legislation which never received final approval. Since the study, erosion on the island has not slowed, and prompt action is imperative if the unique community on the island is to be saved.

The residents of Tangier are direct descendants of early English settlers. Like their 17th-century forbears, the 20th-century islanders speak with an Elizabethan accent, and make their living off the resources of the Chesapeake Bay. If the Tangier natives are forced off the island by continued erosion, the members of this traditional community would face grave social and economic hardships, and the diversity of America's cultural heritage would be significantly diminished.

The erosion on the island also threatens two federally funded construction projects, a water treatment plant and an airport. The recently completed water treatment plant received $3.5 million from the Environmental Protection Agency and the Department of Housing and Urban Development, and the island's airstrip received $1.2 million in Federal funds during its planning and construction. To allow this substantial Federal investment to be endangered would, of course, be most unfortunate. Indeed without swift action both of these facilities may soon disappear into the waters of the Chesapeake Bay.

There are serious water resources development needs in this country which are not being met, and if these needs are not met soon, economic development will suffer, and the lives and property of our citizens will be in danger. Therefore, I urge all of my colleagues to join with the committee to break the deadlock over water resources funding this year, or, if that proves impossible, to see that projects which need immediate attention are authorized and funded on an emergency basis.●

CENTRAL AMERICAN REFUGEES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MCCOLLUM] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. McCOLLUM. Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MICA. Would the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCOLLUM. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. MICA. Could the gentleman give some indication as to the amount of time; how much of the 60 minutes he might use?

Mr. McCOLLUM. I am hopeful I can conclude in somewhere between 15 and 30 minutes. I am not sure of the amount of time.

Mr. Speaker, I have taken this time today to report to the Congress on a factfinding mission that I made a week before last to the Central American countries of El Salvador and Honduras. I spent 2 days in each of those countries, and I have a number of matters that I would like to report on relative to the purpose of the trip, which was down there under the auspices of the Immigration and Refugee Committee.

In El Salvador, one of the primary purposes was to determine the situation with respect to those who are being deported from the United States; Salvadorans, upon their return, and those who are voluntarily returning and how they are treated.

There has been a good deal of controversy in this country about whether or not to extend the voluntary departure of those who are Salvadorans back to their country, and to otherwise maintain the status of those who we might deport.

I would like to first of all report on that, and then discuss the situation within the country of Honduras in particular.

First of all, let us talk for a moment about the folks who voluntarily returned from the United States. There are a lot who go back voluntarily, who are not deported through our official laws, but who choose to return. The way we keep track of those in El Salvador is by virtue of a procedure whereby the Immigration Service, when they are first leaving this country requires a bond, and because of that requirement within so many weeks after they return to El Salvador, most of those folks who go back voluntarily come into our consul's office in El Salvador, in the city of San Salvador, at our Embassy, and seek the return of that bond.

When they do that, we take the opportunity to ask them a lot of questions; politely, and I think in a very thorough manner. I sat in on the questioning of one or two of those individuals, and I am convinced that our embassy folks there are doing an extraordinary job of determining whether or not those who are returned voluntarily are in fact under any harrassment or undue political pressure or human rights violations or whatever.

I have seen, by reviewing the paperwork on those cases that they have already processed and many of them have gone before in the last year, as well as from the interviews I sat in on; I have seen that the overwhelming majority of the folks only talk about economic problems. There are one or two rare instances, of the hundreds that have gone back that are in fact concerned at all with anything that might remotely resemble a violation of any of their human rights as we would know them or political rights or concerns.

However, the issue that has most concerned those in the United States wherein the Salvadoran question is deposited is with the deportees; those who we are forcibly returning, those who might have been in some way sympathetic to the guerrilla activity or whatever. We are returning those in fairly sizable numbers right now; averaging I think substantially better than 30 or more a week; and up until recently we did not have a very good method of pursuing what was happening to those folks.

I can report from my own investigation and observation that the International Committee on Migration, which has its home office in Geneva and which is an international organization, has taken on and is doing an outstanding job monitoring the return of those individuals we deport to El Salvador, and I think has got the matter well in tow.

The ICM, International Committee on Migration, does not have any U.S. personnel operating in this task, and I think they are doing a good job of maintaining independence and credibility. They started their role at the beginning of December, so we have only a very brief period of time to look upon.

We do know from that period of time that several hundred have been deported and several hundred have arrived in El Salvador at the airport, that ICM, the International Committee on Migration, has a person to meet every plane from the United States; that it greets every one of the deportees who comes back from the States; that it provides them with the money and the wherewithal and transportation and housing and food to get to whatever destination they might want; that it asks them questions that I observed being asked in one case while I was at the airport, and I reviewed the procedures, in the logbooks and the records they keep in their office in San Salvador, many others.

They asked them whatever they can do: What is it that we can do to help you? And have been very helpful to everybody who has returned, and I think the program is working exceedingly well.

The question is, How does ICM, how does this procedure assist us in determining what happens to these people once they go back into the country? Well, what happens is, that in the process of interviewing them when they first come off the plane, ICM gives them a couple of forms, envelopes and stamps and asks them to periodically send those back in and report to them on what they discover when they get back home, what it is like, and what kind of conditions they meet and so on.

As a matter of course, although the program had only been operating about 6 weeks when I began to look into it a couple of weeks ago, the fact is that a great number of these folks who have been deported have indeed responded and we have a substantial data base to go from.

In only one instance out of the quite sizable number of responses has there been even the remotest question of any concern over political or violent activity or fear for life or safety or whatever, and that one instance is currently under investigation, both by ICM and by our Embassy personnel at this time.

We are talking about a very small percentage of those returned, if you only have one instance out of several hundred, as I say, who have been deported in the period of time that ICM has been monitoring it. I would be very interested, as I am sure my colleagues would be, in seeing what the fruits of this program are as far as this return goes over the coming months as more are deported, more records are kept, and we have a greater statistical data base to go from.

My impressions tell me that we are going to discover, as I have in the initial impact of this investigation, that those who are here in the United States are Salvadorans who are being deported, and those who are voluntarily returning are not at all under the pressure, under the gun of any nature, either literally or figuratively, from a political or from a human rights standpoint, or from a violent standpoint.

Their problems invariably are being found to be, as most have been in the past, economic; concerns of what has happened to their families as far as economic plights and so forth go.

It will be an interesting thing to follow and at the present moment, it certainly inclines me to be opposed, as a member of the Immigration Committee, to any kind of further special consideration on the return of Salvadorans as opposed to the return of any others who might be apprehended for deportation.

There are still about 500,000 displacados, displaced persons, in El Salvador who are off the farms who have not returned to work because of their concerns and because of the fact that they become pretty well entrenched in some of the camps and in some of the cities and the very poor areas in that country.

It disturbs all of us that we have that condition because the United Nations does not oversee those camps, it does not oversee anything internally since these folks are not technically refugees.

If you will recall, a number of my colleagues joined me, and we were able through the efforts of Project Hope and the Knights of Malta back a year and a half ago through last year to deliver over 200,000 pounds of medicines and medical supplies for the relief of these folks in these displaced persons camps.

I am pleased to report that in the last few months, operationally for about 2 or 3 months, Project Hope has become the grantee of AID funds for the purpose of providing medical care to the displaced persons, and they have already set up a structure, hired employees, under the good guidance of Dr. Long. I examined his program and I am confident that the progress that we would like to see is being made now and that the funds of this Congress appropriated for that purpose are indeed going to the displaced persons in every region of El Salvador; whether it is in the city or in the rural areas, whether it is in the relatively quiet unaffected areas—as far as the war is concerned, or whether it is in the guerrilla-held areas.

It is a remarkable effort by Project Hope, and they are to be commended.

In the meantime, the Knights of Malta have continued their efforts and their clinics and in fact have expanded the contribution worldwide that have come in and that great Catholic order is doing an outstanding job in that country with the situation at hand.

Most recently, AID is working on a contract with CARE to provide the food, and I am impressed not with the great improvement of the status of the people who are displaced—who very badly need to return to their farms and need to get order back in their lives—but with the fact that what efforts we are making now are finally getting through and at least the health and the feeding and the care of these individuals during this stay is in much better shape and condition than it was a year or so ago.

The government in El Salvador we are all very pleased with; it is a democracy. President Duarte received an overwhelming mandate in the election last year, and as far as the people are concerned there is a spirit of optimism like there has not been in El Salvador in a long time.

I spent over an hour discussing matters of state with President Duarte; I met with opposition leader D'Aubuisson, and I explored with Ambassador Pickering all of the matters at hand. I think that we will see as the year progresses that President Duarte and others are going to be most concerned about the economic picture inside their country, as the effort at controlling the guerrillas for the moment is progressing well.

The economy is going to be a very serious matter, and we are going to have to look at some special considerations relative to that country, in my judgment, within the next year. Relative to the export-import question, and I think above and beyond any considerations that are already provided in the Caribbean Basin Initiative.

I would like to turn the attention of my colleagues for a moment to Honduras. Honduras, of course, is a neighboring country to El Salvador, but is also the land mass that falls between the country of Nicaragua and El Salvador. It has become a focal point of considerable debate and concern in this body over the last year or two as we have placed a task force for training our reserve forces inside Honduras, as we have used a base there to train some of the Salvadoran officers, as we have had a continuing concern over the welfare of Honduras itself with the increased activities of the Sandinistas and their apparent movement toward their own human rights violations and close proximity and viewpoint to those views shared by some of the Communist satellite countries, particularly Castro's Cuba.

Honduras I spent 2 days in, as well as El Salvador. I visited both Salvador refugee camps in and along the border of Honduras and El Salvador and I visited the Nicaragua refugee camps along the border of Nicaragua and Honduras. Now, these refugee camps are truly refugee camps. The camps are operated by the United Nations, are under their auspices, with many private voluntary organizations participating. The conditions in those camps and the conditions for life and work and for opportunity are far greater and far better in those camps for those individuals inside Honduras than they are for the hundreds of thousands of disposados, or displaced persons, in camps and in towns, off the farms in El Salvador. Now that does not mean that we want to bring up the conditions in El Salvador to meet those but it is a contrast and it is something that we ought to keep in mind.

The United Nations, as far as I can determine, has done a fine job in providing for these individuals. There is on the Salvadoran border several thousand Salvadoran refugees. In one camp I visited, Mesa Grande, there are about 10,000 Salvadorans today. They are in temporary housing, but they are, as I said, well provided for. There is another base camp with almost as many people in Comayaguela, which is located a little closer to the border. These two primary refugee camps exist there.

Our concern now at least in part is with the fact that there has been an effort made over the last few months to get the Honduras Government to allow the movement of these camps and these refugees further inland, further interior to Honduras and away from this border, away from the conflict, and while some progress was made in the early discussion, that has waned due to some geopolitical problems between the countries of El Salvador and Honduras and some of the other considerations.

But some Salvadorans are returning. Several hundred of them have returned and are returning on somewhat of a regular basis right now to El Salvador. There is a little rivalry between the ICM, the International Committee on Migration, that set up an operation in an attempt to assist those who are returning and the U.N., but other than that, I do not see any great problems on the Salvadoran border.

I am concerned more with what is going on with respect to the Nicaraguan border. On the Nicaraguan border where we have these two refugee camps, we have very few in numbers as far as actual U.N. refugees are concerned, comparatively. There are about 3,500 to 4,000 in two camps down there. One of the camps that I visited is Teupasenti. Teupasenti is a little village town that has been carved out for coffee growing and for workers to live in for the coffee growing area quite off the beaten track. It took a bit of effort to get into this camp. The temporary housing is very limited there. Most of the refugees live in the real housing that is there and I think they are also being very well cared for.

Most recently and most disturbing to the U.N. folks and to our people with regard to the refugees themselves is that there are several hundred young males who have come out of Managua in order not to be conscripted into the Nicaraguan Army who are in those camps. Those camps are predominantly farmers who are less educated or not educated at all and these young males, ages 17 to 22 or so, are for the most part college educated, or at least high school educated, and they are very restless, not willing to do their share of the work and so on. Those numbers are growing. So we may very well hear about the young male population dominating some of these refugee camps. They are picked up by the Honduran Government and given the choice of being shipped back to Nicaragua or going to the refugee camps. It is a bone of considerable concern in the international community at the present moment.

But what concerns me the most is what I learned from talking with the refugees that I met there, the Nicaraguan refugees, talking with Ambassador Negroponte, talking with our DCN Shepard Lowman, talking with Vince Shields in intelligence, visiting with Colonel Percy and spending a lot of time with our task force and learning about what is going on with respect to the Contras and with respect to what we might anticipate from the current status of affairs and what is likely to occur in the next few months with regard to refugees, as well as the whole Central American picture.

Quite frankly, out of the entire visit this concerns me the most and I think it should concern you the most.

First of all, as my colleagues know, this Congress has not supported the Contras, the so-called freedom fighters, since June of last year. In that period of time they have continued to operate against the Sandinista forces inside Nicaragua, but with every decreasing ability to do so. For one thing they have no longer the air capacity to airlift supplies to the interior that they did at one time. They are running low on ammunition. And about half of their numbers—there are about 14,000 in their army—have come out to a base camp not far from Teupasenti and were there at the time that I visited the region. There is a question of how many of these will be going back in the next few months, but there is no doubt in the minds of our officials, and there is no doubt in my mind that unless this Congress provides renewed support for the Contras, they will indeed no longer be a force to be contended with in a matter of a few months.

Exactly how long is not clear. But as we know there are gunship helicopters now in Nicaragua that I for one think we should have protested a lot more than we did. There is an increased military force. There is a determination on the part of the Sandinistas to rub out the FDN—and that is who the Contras are. And there is a tremendous problem with respect to the future of this group. I might add while we are talking about it that the FDN—there were three organizations, now there is largely just the one major force for the freedom fight down there against the Sandinistas—the FDN is headed by a man known as Adolpho Carrero. Adolpho was the head of Coca Cola inside the country of Nicaragua during the Somoza period and was the leader of the opposition party to Somoza. There is very little contact with anyone relative to the Somozan regime among these folks at the present time involved in this freedom fighting organization with 14,000 in their armed forces.

So I submit while we are talking about it that for the record at least we ought to recognize that most of the people involved are farmers, most of the people are very disenchanted with the Sandinistas or were themselves Sandinistas previously who fought the revolution against Somoza and certainly do not like what they see happening today inside the country.

At any rate, the problem that I see happening and what I want to bring to the attention of my colleagues, particularly today, from the assessment of all concerned when the Contras' effort collapses—now, please hear this—when the Contra effort collapses the estimate of our Embassy down there is that between 150,000 and 200,000 refugees will cross the Nicaraguan-Honduran border within a period of 3 to 6 months. That is a very realistic estimate based on what is clearly observable to the support contingent inside Nicaragua for these Contras.

What is going to happen when we see 150,000 to 200,000 new refugees from Nicaragua inside Honduras? Well, I would submit that while we may see opposition to it that there is going to be a sense of moral imperative in this body and in the other body for the bringing of a great number of these to the United States because we did support the Contras to begin with and we are going to feel a responsibility to those who are driven out as a result of the failure and collapse of the Contra effort.

For those from my home State of Florida there is going to be a special concern, because while the Salvadoran refugees tend to go to Los Angeles and California and that great State, the Nicaraguan refugees tend to go to south Florida and join their friends in the Cuban-American community there and Nicaraguans who have already left.

But it is not a question of where they are going to go, it is a question of reality. We are going to be faced undoubtedly with having to deal with thousands of refugees from that region in very short order if the Contra assistance is not continued.

Then what happens next? Well, the best analysis available and I think everybody agrees on this that is down there on the scene, and I happen to agree with it, is that within a period of months after the collapse of the Contras the Sandinistas will consolidate inside. The human rights violations will speed up. The property and interest that have been allowed to continue will probably no longer be allowed to function in the same manner and those who have expressed outward opposition, although muffled, will then be silenced.

As that occurs, the disenchanted and those are primarily the farmers and those are the people who are in the refugee camps, not Contras now, but farmers who are not participating in the freedom fighting business, who told me again and again in the interviews that I did that they do not like a darn bit what the Sandinistas are doing the way they handle their crops and they spoke out and they ran off because they were afraid for their safety as a result of that.

It is these folks and their friends, those just like them inside Nicaragua, who are going to at that point come out in the thousands and thousands more, in the second and third and fourth wave of migration.

Now, I remind my colleagues that we are not talking about a Cuba, where we have a water area to separate it from the mainland, where there is some ability to control migration. We are not talking about a Vietnamese situation, where yes, the Thais have experienced tremendous problems, but there is a great land mass between them that is difficult to navigate for those who seek refuge, and then a great water border elsewhere. We are talking about Nicaragua that borders on Honduras, with a vast border that is easier to cross, impossible to seal, and an easy trek and path from there through Mexico to the United States. I would submit we are going to see thousands more when that occurs.

What happens after that? And I think I would not be doing my duty if I did not warn my colleagues of my fears that are realistic about what will happen next, not about some gigantic, immediate collapse of the region or something, but what will likely happen will be this:

If the Salvadorans are continuing as they are now, with a relatively good democracy, in due course, because of our refusal to assist the Contras and because of the Sandinistas' ability to consolidate in country, not have to worry about the Contras anymore, and because when that happens the Hondurans are certainly not going to be standing so tall they are going to be trying to accommodate the Sandinistas at that point, we are going to see increased activity on the part of Nicaraguan Sandinistas to support the rebels inside El Salvador and increased ability to do that without being interfered with. They are going to be able to use, with some looking of the other way, Honduran land as sanctuary for this purpose, and they can turn their full attention and, believe you me, every indictation from Ortega and Borja and everyone else down there in that Sandinista regime says that is exactly what they are going to do, they are going to turn their attention to subverting democracy in El Salvador, and the rebel forces will rise and instability will increase in El Salvador, and I can only vaguely outline the manner and form in which that regime that we so proudly have been promoting and are pleased with may come to its knees.

Now, that is a sad thought, but that is precisely what we have to face as reality if we do not do anything about it and if we do not support the Contras.

Will we intervene to stop that? I do not know. What happens next? I do not know, and I do not think we do either. But I do know that at some point, as this series and scenario progresses, and instability might occur in Guatemala and Mexico, at some point the United States is going to intervene and going to intervene with American troops and going to intervene with bloodshed of American boys that I do not want to see, and I do not think that scenario is at all necessary.

So I come back from Central America, from a trip to El Salvador and Honduras, my third time in El Salvador and first time in Honduras, with a great sense of concern about where we go and what happens if we turn the other cheek and just ignore the situation down there. We are not going to get the kind of accommodation that is meaningful out of the Sandinistas. I cannot see that, and nobody on the scene does either. It is not realistic to expect hardened, philosophical Communists to come around to anything but some kind of an agreement that they will have on paper, if they ever have it with us under the conditions that we are now setting up, that they will break quietly and quickly in their own way to allow the scenario I described to unfold.

The only way we can operate without having to face in a few years the question of our own commitment of our own soldiers, in my judgment, is for us to come to grips with this whole question of Contras either covertly, overtly or however, and provide the necessary support to at least the extent of getting some very meaningful and true concessions out of the Nicaraguan Government, including the elimination of the outside armed aggressive forces of Castro, the PLO who are in there actively now, the Khomeini interests who are there, the Soviet arms shipments that are coming in on a regular basis, and the quelling of that passion. And I truly hope that the President will submit at the end of February, the first of March, a request to us for renewed support for the Contras and that every one of the Members of this body will seriously look upon the consequences of not doing something with it and make a sane judgment to look at the situation from a realistic standpoint about what we do to deal with it before it becomes too great for us to control without the use of American forces.

Now, I cannot leave the scene without commenting on our task forces down there. Colonel Percy is just about the only one there for any length of time, for about a year. But I did talk and have time, because we were grounded in there with a low cover for a while, in the efforts to take a helicopter and go to Mesa Grande to visit with Salvadoran refugees, I was in there for several hours and I talked to a lot of our reserve personnel. What we are doing there with our task force in Honduras is literally training the Reserve units of our Army and other branches of the service in Honduras. They fly down there on short missions of a few weeks, no more than 3 weeks in most cases, on assignment, and those folks down there, regardless of the geopolitical questions of the mission and other purposes that might be debated, those personnel tell me this is absolutely the best Reserve training that we have ever been able to give the Reserve components of our Armed Forces. And disregarding the political issues, for the moment, of our presence in Central America, we ought not let the opportunity pass to seriously consider a long-term arrangement for Reserve training in Honduras. The terrain is right, the climate is right, the situation and locale are right, the people are well received, and it is an ideal training situtation for our young men and women in the Armed Forces. I also must say under some hardship, because they do not have, because of our insistence on no permanent presence down there for the political concerns that are expressed by members of the two bodies, they do not have the kind of support that they really need in experienced personnel in-country who can be there for longer than that 2- to 3-month period. They need that. Not for 3 years, but at least for, a few of them, a year long as Colonel Percy is. And I expressed this to Secretary Weinberger. But I know other Members, out of other fears, have expressed concerns in the opposite direction.

But we must not undermine the training operation and the training opportunities that we have in Honduras because of some panic or fear or political concern over the possibilities that we are doing something that we are not supposed to, in violation of the previous accords that this Congress passed on restrictions on assistance to Contras.

And while we are talking about that, going back to the Contras for a minute, one of the things I was really impressed with, in talking with our personnel at the Embassy, as well as in the task force, is how far they go, to what extreme they go, to avoid assisting the Contras. They go to carry out the mandate of this Congress to that regard to such an extent that, while I was down there, the intelligence operations knew of the movement of forces of the Sandinistas that were adverse to the Contras and they were not even telling them about it, not even saying there was a movement let alone giving them any indication of where it was going or what it was doing. I personally think that we are getting ready for a national disgrace, a national tragedy, and that is going to be on the heads not of the President, assuming that he comes forward, as I would expect him to do in another month or so and ask for renewed Contra assistance, but on this body, on Members of Congress, when we finally see the American public looking at this picture a few months from now and realizing that the good guys were the Contras, the bad guys were the Sandinistas, we did not help the Contras, in fact by our holding the hands of our personnel behind their backs we have assisted very, very much the Sandinista bad guys, and we see not only the collapse of the Contras and the horrors that go with that, but we will see the refugee migration that I have described earlier in the thousands to this country as well as to other parts of the world and the tremendous and almost impossible problem to deal with Sandinistas, once they have consolidated power and they are able to use a stronger base to spread subversion to the other regions of that part of the world.

It is not a problem that is somewhere on the other side of the Earth. The problem of what happens in this hemisphere, just a few miles away, with San Salvador closer to Washington, DC, than Washington, DC, is to Los Angeles, or, for that matter, many parts of Texas, that close, with a land mass between us and not water, it is not something we can just turn our heads the other way and ignore, it is not something we can simply turn our heads and say that we will make some paper accommodation and then let us see what happens to the Sandinistas, whom all of our people in the Embassy and in the intelligence force knows are simply the bad guys and we know what they are going to do if we let them run their course. We cannot afford to do that. We might be able to get away with it somewhere else, but we cannot get away with it down there.

Well, anyway, it is not a totally pleasant report. As I said earlier, the refugee situation at the moment is in good hands. I am pleased with what is happening in El Salvador and Honduras with regard to the displaced persons and the refugees and the returnees from El Salvador, but I see very ominous signals for the short run and tremendous storm clouds for the long run for our own people, not to mention theirs, for freedom and democracy in this hemisphere and the future generations of our country as well as this hemisphere if we do not take heed of those warning and we do not look at them.

And last, as I close this special order time, I would like to urge each of you, my colleagues, to make a special effort this spring to go down there yourself and look at those situations.

Do not just go to the two countries that I went to; if you can, go to others. But take the time, if it is only for a couple of days, take the time to go those few miles, that short distance, and examine what I have described to you. I think in good conscience most of you are going to come back with the same conclusions that I had.

I hope maybe, I pray, maybe, that with that in mind, a sizable majority of our Congress can come to grips with the reality and take the steps necessary to support freedom and democracy in Central America, and do what we can to stop the spread that is going on of the forces of totalitarianism in that region of the world.

I am very delighted to have been able to make the report and I yield back the rest of my time.

MR. McINTYRE HAS NOT YET BEEN SWORN IN TO HIS RIGHTFUL PLACE IN OFFICE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BOULTER] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. BOULTER. Mr. Speaker, this is the 28th day since I and 33 of my Republican colleagues were sworn in on this House floor. It is also the 28th day, Mr. Speaker, since one of our colleagues, Mr. Rick McIntyre, who has in fact won twice now from the Eighth District of Indiana, has not been sworn in to his rightful place of office.

We are hearing talk now from the Democrat side of the aisle that the recount, having been completed, that is all of the disputed ballots were counted, then somehow or another Mr. McIntyre would be some 20-plus votes ahead. Mr. Speaker, we have tried to understand that argument and to analyze it, and we believe that it is not supported by any facts; that it is simply an allegation.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The gentleman just made a misstatement that he would want to correct on the RECORD: He said the name "McIntyre"; I think he means "Mr. McCloskey." That Mr. McCloskey would win by 20 votes under the Democratic scenario that no one has been able at this point to validate in any way, shape or form, but which they run around making claims for. I do not think we want the RECORD to reflect it exactly as the gentleman said it.

The gentleman is right in the general drift of what he is trying to say. The Democrat claims with regard to that election just have absolutely no validity whatsoever. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. BOULTER. I thank the gentleman for his correction.

Mr. Speaker, the Democrats are claiming that Mr. McCloskey would be 20-plus votes ahead. Now, I think the dangerous thing about this argument is that this argument, coupled with the action of this House in not seating Mr. McIntyre, could set a very, very dangerous precedent. By refusing to recognize the certified winner from the Eighth District race in Indiana, a race which has been recounted, with the results now confirming a McIntyre victory by some 418 votes, the Democrat leadership is effectively disenfranchising over half a million people in the Eighth District of Indiana.

By vowing to leave that seat vacant until they can come up with some formula by which they can throw the election to their man, the Democrat leadership is blatantly ignoring the State election law of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the last time I heard, Indiana was a sovereign State in these United States.

If you think about it, the precedent set in this situation could conceivably allow the Democrats to go into any State, even into the State of Texas, and claim that the election laws are invalid. They could do that in any one of the 50 States, and at their whim, refuse to seat Members of Congress who have been duly elected.

Mr. Speaker, this is a precedent which must not be allowed to be set. Rick McIntyre won this election; not Mr. McCloskey, Rick McIntyre has been duly certified by the highest election officer in this State; not Mr. McCloskey. Rick McIntyre deserves his place in this 99th Congress.

Mr. BOULTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

What we have here is at best a very questionable constitutional procedure that is being used, and perhaps an outright unconstitutional procedure that is being used to deny a duly certified Member of Congress his seat in this Congress, on the mistaken notion put forth by the Democrats, and on mistaken precedents put forth by the Democrats, which indicate that we in this House can make that decision for the people of Indiana.

I know of no constitutional precedent, I know of no legal precedent which suggests that the people of Indiana shall be denied the right to choose their own elected Member of Congress. Yet, that is what the Democrats are asking us to accept right now. Mr. McIntyre won the election on election night, he won the election in the recount that has taken place, and now we are continuing to hear from the Democrats that they refuse to seat this Member of Congress because somehow the election ought to be recounted here and decided here.

Now, that is precisely the opposite of everything that the forefathers ever believed about our constitutional system. One of the things they tried to make certain of was that the Federal Government could not make those kinds of decisions; that local people and States could make the determination about the people that they sent here, without having people of, by, and for Washington make those decisions for them.

The Democrats have now figured out that they cannot win elections out in the country; that history is passing them by; that their philosophy simply cannot carry the majority of votes in many areas. Therefore, they have reapportioned this country in ways that allows them to protect themselves, and in this case, where the reapportionment did not serve to allow them to win the seat, now they are attempting to steal the seat in this body by turning the matter not over to the State of Indiana to determine the outcome of the election, where the Constitution makes very clear that matters should be settled, but rather turning the matter over to the House Administration Committee, where they just happen to hold nearly a 2-to-1 edge and where they can make the determination here in Washington.

This is absolutely terrible; it is an absolutely wrong precedent, and what we would end up with out of this is a precedent that will allow more and more seats to be determined under this procedure. What we are suggesting now is that if you win by some 400 votes, you may well have your election thrown into the House Administration Committee where a super majority of members of that committee will make the determination as to whether or not you are a Member of Congress.

The people of this country have long believed that our democracy says that if you go out and you compete in an election and you win by one vote, you in fact have won that election and are someone who should be able to serve in the body where you won the election. That is precisely what is being violated here. We are now having the creation of a whole series of myths about this election, so that in my mind what the Democrats can ultimately do is attempt to throw out the election that took place in November and get a special election later on that they would hope to win then by some nefarious procedure.

I feel very strongly that the case here is not just the case of Rick McIntyre and the people of his district who deserve to be presented, and he deserves to have his seat in this body. But the case goes far beyond that; the case goes to all 435 seats in this country, because all 435 Members are under the jeopardy of this kind of procedure. That is because from now on in, if you do not measure up to the standards of this body, despite the fact you have been elected in your seat, you have been elected in your State, certified by your State as the winner, you may in fact not get your seat in the Congress. That is a horrible way to proceed. There is no excuse for us sitting by and watching that happening. I think the defense of the majority party, of their actions in this regard, is one of the saddest commentaries on modern politics that has ever been written.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. BOULTER. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania points out, in this strategy set up by the Democratic leadership, what we have is a series of myths, absolute myths, and one of those myths is that Washington, or this body, the House of Representatives, is the body that should decide this election outcome.

It is interesting to note that Mr. McCloskey first told the Indiana courts and the U.S. district court in Evansville that the Federal Contested Elections Act vests in the House of Representatives sole and exclusive jurisdiction over congressional elections. He argued that the State of Indiana had no authority to conduct a recount and, again, the Federal court refused his request to enjoin the recount.

It is also interesting to note, Mr. WALKER, that Mr. McCloskey never did file a contest under the Federal Contested Elections Act.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOULTER. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding, because I think what Mr. McCloskey needs to do is read his Constitution rather than the Federal Contested Election Act, and so on.

The fact is that the Constitution makes it very clear that the reason why the Federal courts would not enjoin that recount is because they probably read that Constitution. The Constitution, in section 4 of article I, makes it quite clear that times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof.

That is precisley what took place in Indiana. They set the time, the place, and the manner for holding the election. They even had a manner for recounting that election where there was some question. All of that has been prescribed. That is what the Constitution says about how Members of Congress shall get here. That is the reason why the Federal courts will not listen to Mr. McCloskey's argument. It has no validity in fact.

Beyond that, in section 5 it does say that each House shall be the judge of elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members; however, all of the precedents under that particular section of the Constitution make it clear that the House cannot unlawfully deprive a State of its equal representation in this body.

That is precisely what we are doing in this House right now. We are unlawfully depriving the State of Indiana of their rightful representation within this House, and that is what every precedent suggests it is not possible to do. So Mr. McCloskey's claim to the Indiana courts and the U.S. district court simply comes from a man who evidently did not bother to read the Constitution.

Mr. BOULTER. So the gentleman's point, I believe, is that even according to the U.S. Constitution, this procedure is one that is up to the States, the individual States.

Mr. WALKER. The gentleman is absolutely correct.

Mr. BOULTER. And I would also point out, if my understanding is correct, that in these counties where the recount was taking place, in most of those cases the people who were responsible for conducting that recount most of the time were three-person committees, and two of those three were Democrats.

Mr. COBLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOULTER. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. COBLE. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, last week I had the good fortune to address a history class in my district, the Sixth District of North Carolina. As the group adjourned, time after time each student would come to me and say, "Oh, I am sure you must be proud to be in the House," and I responded, "I am indeed proud to be a Member of this sitting body," Mr. Speaker; proud on the one hand, ashamed, however, on the other hand at what appears to be a willful disregard for fairness and equity, and I allude, of course, to the McIntyre matter in Indiana.

Rick McIntyre clearly appears to have been duly elected by the voters of the Eighth District of Indiana, but that is apparently not good enough for this body, for his seat on this floor remains vacant, his seat on this floor remains unoccupied, his seat on this floor remains inactive. Yes, his seat on this floor has been silenced, and the silence, Mr. Speaker, and ladies and gentlemen of the House, has taken the form of a muzzle that has been improperly and unfairly affixed.

The prayer breakfast this morning that I am sure most of my colleagues attended demonstrated bipartisan politics at its best. The manner in which the McIntyre case has been handled by this body, by the majority of this body, demonstrates partisan politics at its worst.

This body's decision to deny membership to Rick McIntyre constitutes, in my opinion, an abuse of power and a violation of trust, and those who suffer most directly and most painfully, it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, are the innocent residents of the Eighth District of Indiana, who simply ask to be represented by a Congressman whom they have elected.

The recount of votes, as my good friend from Texas just reminded us, enlarged the McIntyre margin—I think you said this—from the initial lead of 34 to a lead of 415 votes. But 415 votes, Mr. Speaker and ladies and gentlemen, apparently is not sufficient to satisfy the leaders of this body. If a victory margin of 415 is not sufficient today, what will be the magic number that must be required tomorrow—500, 1,000, 1,500 perhaps?

These rhetorical questions illuminate the arrogance we have disseminated across this land with the handling or the mishandling, I should say, of the Rick McIntyre matter.

I am about to conclude, and I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, it is a dangerous precedent that we have hammered out here, and I do not like to use the possessive because I did not hammer it out; I voted against it. But it is a dangerous precedent. The ship, it seems to me, is headed for the reefs and the shoals of blatant unfairness and inequity, and hypocrisy, for that matter.

We should, in the nautical sense, come about, reverse our course, seat Rick McIntyre, and get on with the business, the pressing business of this Nation.

Mr. BOULTER. I thank the gentleman for his remarks.

Mr. Speaker, it is interesting that the gentleman was talking about Congressman-elect McIntyre, how many more votes he might have to get. The interesting thing about that is that I talked with him on the telephone the other day when the recount had been completed, and he said to me, "BEAU, I am 415 votes ahead. that is about an elevenfold increase." His question was, "How many more times do I have to increase that? How many more votes do we have to get before I will be seated?" And I did not have a good answer.

Mr. BARTON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOULTER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BARTON of Texas. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, down in Texas where I come from we have an old saying that I think is probably universal in the United States that close only counts in horseshoes. I think we are going to have to change that; that close only counts in horseshoes and U.S. congressional races if you are the Democratic candidate and you come close.

I think that is a terrible precedent to set, as my honorable colleague from North Carolina just stated. We have heard a lot of talk in the last week or so about votes being stolen and on this floor this morning we heard some talk that the Republican recount commissioners disenfranchised some of the Democratic voters in the Eighth Congressional District of Indiana.

I took the time to look at the numbers, which may be somewhat unusual in this body, to take the time to actually go back and look at the facts, and I found out that in the recount that was just concluded last week, the Democratic candidate, Mr. McCloskey, gained votes in five counties, he lost votes in seven counties, and he stayed the same in two counties.

Mr. BOULTER. Will the gentleman repeat that?

Mr. BARTON of Texas. In the recount that was just concluded, there were a total of 15 counties in Indiana's Eighth District. The Democratic candidate, Mr. McCloskey, lost votes in seven counties, he gained votes in five counties, and he stayed the same in two counties.

The Republican candidate, Mr. McIntyre, stayed the same in three counties. He gained in one county, and he lost votes in the rest of the counties. He lost votes in 11 counties. In 11 of those 15 counties, the Democrats controlled the recount commission 2 to 1. There was a total of 4,808 votes thrown out. Mr. McIntyre lost 2,212; Mr. McCloskey lost 2,596.

The county in which most of the votes were disallowed was Vanderburgh County. In Vanderburgh County Mr. McIntyre lost 1,494 votes and Mr. McCloskey lost 2,049 votes. In that county the Democrats controlled the recount commission 2 to 1.

How can the Republicans be accused of stealing an election when they controlled the recount commission in 11 of the 15 counties and in the county that most of the votes were thrown out in the Democrats controlled that 2 to 1? Mr. McIntyre, who is now accused, according to the Democrats, of stealing the election, lost votes in all but three of four counties.

I would like some of my Democratic colleagues to come back on the floor of the House and let us debate this thing on the facts. The facts are right here.

We have in this House set a dangerous precedent. Now I want to set some precedents. I want to set some precedents in this Congress that we pass a balanced-budget amendment. I want to set a precedent in this Congress that we allow our schoolchildren to voluntarily pray in the public schools if they so desire. I want to set a precedent of working with the President of the United States to reach a verifiable arms control agreement with the Soviet Union. But I do not want to set a precedent of saying that "close only counts in horseshoes and the U.S. Congress in elections if you are the Democratic candidate."

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTON of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Texas for yielding, and I would like to compliment the gentleman for taking this special order, as well as for showing such leadership on such a very sensitive and emotional issue in the first days of his first of many terms to come in the House of Representatives.

Mr. BARTON of Texas. We felt that we could do no less than call this issue to the attention of the American people.

Mr. WEBER. I think so. The point is that I think the American people, more so than perhaps many in Washington, are becoming aware of what the real issue is, and I would like to share with my colleagues some of the thoughts expressed in a recent editorial of the Detroit News of January 28, 1985, just this week.

The Detroit News, for the information of our colleagues, is the largest-circulation daily newspaper in the State of Michigan and has a long and honorable tradition of involvement in the politicial and economic affairs of that part of the country.

If I might, Mr. Speaker, at this point I ask unanimous consent that following my remarks the entire text of this editorial be included in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Speaker, I am not going to read the entire editorial, but I do want to quote from the editorial, which is entitled "The Undemocratic Party."

The editorial begins by saying:

The Democratic Party, ostensibly the party of compassion and fairness, has decided that Republican votes don't count in Indiana's Eighth Congressional District. Indiana's secretary of state has certified Richard McIntyre as the victor in his race against previous incumbent Democrat Frank McCloskey, and a recount this week widened his ostensible margin of victory from 34 votes to 415 votes.

But House Speaker Tip O'Neill and Tony Coelho, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, have declared the voters and the Indiana officials wrong.

Therein lies, if I might say it, really one of the essential issues here. There is a serious constitutional issue. The Constitution does provide for means of deciding these kinds of disputed election contests, but the House of Representatives is not the only decider of these kinds of contests. The Constitution specifies that the State itself shall make determinations of who wins elections, and only when a State itself cannot decide who is going to win should this body be able to judge the case then on the merits of membership.

The Detroit News editorial goes on to state, quite accurately, I might say to my colleagues, all of the facts involved in the case, both from a legal and electoral and political point of view. I would like to again quote from the editorial of the Detroit News on some of their conclusions after they analyzed the case from an independent and nonpartisan perspective.

House leaders have merely confirmed that they believe in the one-man, one-vote concept only if it favors Democrats. Democrats won 50.03 percent of the popular vote for House seats this year, but district lines drawn by state legislatures gave them 58.16 percent of the seats in the House. By the same token, the membership on key committees hardly reflects Americans' preferences on policy. Democrats hold 58.7 percent of the votes on the Budget and Armed Services committees and 61.4 percent of the seats on the Appropriations Committee.

The McIntyre case demonstrates with frightening clarity how politicians can abandon their principles for partisan reasons. In a fairer world, the House would seat Richard McIntyre provisionally, and let the courts or the sovereign people of Indiana do what they must to resolve matters further. He has, by any reasonable standard, won that seat fairly. His only sin seems to be that he didn't win by enough votes to make Tip O'Neill happy.

Mr. Speaker, I would just suggest to my colleagues that that is very strong language, perhaps stronger language than we as Members would use in talking about the motives of our colleagues, but it is the language used by one of our Nation's leading newspapers, the largest-circulation newspaper in the State of Michigan. I think it is a point of view that is going to be increasingly reflected across the country.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. BARTON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman one question about his remarks?

Does the gentleman know of any other case where one person held the certificate of election, only one person having been certified, and that person was refused to be seated under similar circumstances?

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTON of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. WEBER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, this is an absolutely unprecedented case. In my judgment, the Democratic leadership on this issue has tried to trump up a precedent by citing the Roush case of 1961, which is really not a precedent. It was indeed a contested election in that where was a contest or a dispute within the State of Indiana over who was the certified winner of that election. This is the only time, to my knowledge, in the entire history of the Republic, that the only certified winner of an election has been denied his seat.

Mr. BARTON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for clearing that matter up.

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding, and at this point, under my unanimous-consent request, I include the entire text of the editorial to which I referred, as follows:

THE UNDEMOCRATIC PARTY

The Democratic Party, ostensibly the party of compassion and fairness, has decided that Republican votes don't count in Indiana's 8th Congressional District. Indiana's secretary of state has certified Richard McIntyre as the victor in his race against previous incumbent Democrat Frank McCloskey, and a recount this week widened his ostensible margin of victory from 34 votes to 415 votes.

But House Speaker Tip O'Neill and Tony Coelho, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, have declared the voters and the Indiana officials wrong. "Nothing has changed the fact that Frank McCloskey won on Election Day, and an honest, complete, and nonpartisan vote count will confirm that," Rep. Coelho said recently. So the Washington polls have voted themselves the power to overturn the judgment of the people of Indiana.

Here's what happened. Republicans learned on election eve that the returns from two precincts had been counted twice, giving Mr. McCloskey an apparent victory. They asked the local county clerk to notify the secretary of state that the results from that county were in error, but the clerk, a Democrat, refused. Republicans took the matter to court, where a Democratic judge eventually ordered the clerk to amend the results. When that was done, Mr. McIntyre was certified the winner by the secretary of state (a Republican), and the results were forwarded to the clerk of the U.S. House of Representatives.

Under normal procedures, that would have been the end of the matter. No one had alleged fraud in the election, and no one implied that Mr. McIntyre had done anything shady or undignified. Democrats didn't even bother to challenge the results under the Contested Elections Act, which sets forth a procedure for reviewing very tight elections. The law in effect lets the House review an election much as a court would—taking depositions, reviewing evidence, even demanding a new election. At first, they tried to have the recount thrown out, asking a federal court to find fault with Indiana's recount procedure. The judge dismissed the case.

Meanwhile, a series of recounts was taking place in Indiana. County clerks appointed three-member, bipartisan election review boards, which examined ballots and double-checked procedures. Those recounts enlarged Mr. McIntyre's margin by 381 votes.

Still, Reps. O'Neill and Coelho wouldn't rest. They strong-armed colleagues into accepting House Resolution 1—the first legislation of the session—that essentially gave the House Administration Committee, and not the people of Indiana, final say about the election. The Democratic leaders argued that a 1961 case, in which Democrat Ed Rousch was seated after earlier results had given Republican George Chambers the victory, offers a precedent. But in that case, the Indiana secretary of state invalidated his own certification of victory for Mr. Chambers, after verifying charges of election fraud. As we noted above, there were no such charges or changes in certification this time around.

House leaders have merely confirmed that they believe in the one-man, one-vote concept only if it favors Democrats. Consider a few interesting statistics: Democrats won 50.03 percent of the popular vote for House seats this year, but district lines drawn by state legislatures gave them 58.16 of the seats in the House. By the same token, the membership on key committees hardly reflects Americans' preferences on policy. Democrats hold 58.7 percent of the votes on the Budget and Armed Services committees and 61.4 percent of the seats on the Appropriations Committee.

The McIntyre case demonstrates with frightening clarity how politicians can abandon their principles for partisan reasons. In a fairer world; the House would seat Richard McIntyre provisionally, and let the courts or the sovereign people of Indiana do what they must to resolve matters further. He has, by any reasonable standard, won that seat fairly. His only sin seems to be that he didn't win by enough votes to make Tip O'Neill happy.

Mr. ROWLAND of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTON of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. ROWLAND of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

There has been a lot of talk this morning and this afternoon about inequities and about the partisan politics that have taken place in this House. I think one of the other things we have talked about is the future of our electoral process and how we are going to affect the public and the many young people that we see watching this circumstance evolve.

As the youngest Member of Congress, I have had a number of opportunities, unique opportunities, to speak across my district and across my State, and during these discussions I continually urge young people to get involved in this political process, to run for office, to register to vote, and to participate in legislative opportunities. I tell them of the great opportunity that we have in this country to represent 500,000 people in an institution that I think is the greatest and finest in the entire world. I talk of the great pride that we have here and that we have shown and talked about.

But a few weeks ago, on January 3, we experienced an event that I am not very proud of. We experienced an event that disturbs me very much and obviously disturbs all of us very much, an event that may affect the attitudes of many young people who are watching this Congress and deciding whether to get involved in this legislative process. A duly elected Member of this House was asked to stand aside during the January 3 ceremonies, allegedly because he had not won by enough votes.

We have had a number of recounts, and Mr. McIntyre has accumulated a plurality of somewhere around 418 votes. That is 417 more votes than he needed to win this election, and for the first time in American history, as was pointed out, the majority party in this House is attempting to circumvent the election process in this country. As concerned freshmen, we are speaking out and urging the American people to take heed. It is a sad thing in this country when such partisan politics takes place in these great Halls.

I hope, as we all do, that this event will be corrected, and that when I have an opportunity again to speak with the many young people across my State, I can do it with the same enthusiasm, and I hope I can do it with the same pride I felt before January 3 when this event took place.

This event in Indiana must not set a precedent. It must not set a precedent in this House or in our electoral process, and I hope that we are not going to view this situation as a matter of routine election process but, rather, as an unfortunate decision that was made by the majority party and that will hopefully be corrected.

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTON of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I would like to compliment the gentleman in the well, as well as his colleagues from the freshman Republican class, for taking this time out and for coming to the floor and voicing their absolute outrage at what has happened.

As I look over on the other side and see our many friends, many of whom believe very strongly in States rights and, I think, many of whom still embrace some of the democratic principles, I would almost urge them to start a new party or a new faction within the Democratic Party, and perhaps they could call it "Democrats for Democracy" or perhaps "Democrats for Constitutional Government."

As a freshman coming here to this institution, you must be absolutely outraged and shocked, not only at what has happened here, but when you see a party that is so unsure of itself that it refuses to seat one freshman Member, despite the fact that he has been certified across the board, you must be further shocked and absolutely outraged when you see what the Democratic Party has done under its rules regarding the placement of Members on committees.

Of course, even more insidious is what they are doing right now. As we are standing here there are caucuses all over the Hill on the various committees cutting down our representation even further on subcommittees. This is an absolute outrage.

I recently just got back, within the last few weeks, from the Union of South Africa, and there I viewed an apartheid which I thought was despicable. I thought it was disgraceful and I think it is an absolute outrage that the South African Government is not honoring one man/one vote, one of the basic principles that I thought we in the United States embraced. Yet I see the same thing going on to a lesser degree but still going on right here in the House of Representatives.

I have seen on television many of our Members march to the South African Embassy and be arrested so they can register their outrage in a very real sense, and yet these same great liberals will come back here and when talking about the power of the Democratic Party they are so insensitive or perhaps I should say insecure that the dogma, that the rhetoric, that their exact position will not be imposed on the American people, that they take the various committees of this Congress and stack them in an unconscionable fashion.

Again I want to compliment you. I think that perhaps many of the Members on our side have gotten used to getting kicked around. But you are certainly not used to it. I am not used to it yet, and I do not intend to stay here so long that I will become used to it.

I would encourage you to keep up the good fight, keep focusing attention upon this outrage. When you are on the side of right you should stay there and stay vocal, and I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. BOULTER. I thank you, sir. We may get kicked around, but we are not going to apologize when we do get kicked around.

Mr. ARMEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOULTER. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Texas.

Mr. ARMEY. I would like to express my outrage and my concern not as a Member of this House but as an American citizen who has had the opportunity to visit this House for at least one term by the good graces of the voters in my district.

When I entered my race for Congress I had absolutely no political background. I had no political connections. That did not bother me because I took faith in the one man/one vote principle. I believed in the principle of election by the ballot, and I declared my candidacy.

During my opening declaration I had a question posed to me by a reporter from the Fort Worth Star Telegram by a man named Jack Smith, a question that surprised me and confused me until January 3. Mr. Smith asked me if I had contacted any Members of the U.S. House of Representatives to see if they wanted me to join them in the House. I did not quite know how to respond to that because I did not know any Members of the U.S. House of Representatives. But I told him that I did not think that was necessary, that I was looking for the endorsement of the people of the district, and I was confident that if they gave me more votes than they did the other fellow that I would have my seat here in the House of Representatives, and my son and I, and many, many volunteers who believed in the things I believed in went out and campaigned, and by golly, we won more votes than the other fellow, and I came here and I was seated in the House.

That is the way I understand the process to work. That is the way the citizens that I talked to believed the process works. And I for one refuse to accept the proposition or the precedent that will let other candidates in the future understand they better check with the Members of Congress and see if they will be accepted when they get here. I do not think that is the way it should be.

I do not think Mr. McIntyre understood the need to do that. I do not think the rest of these Members did that. It is not by the benevolence or perhaps the oversight of the Democrat majority of the Members of this House that I have my seat. It is by the will of the people who gave me 6,700 more votes than they gave the other fellow.

That is what America is founded on. That is what the future of this Nation must stand on, and I think the time has come that this body correct its error and seat Mr. McIntyre and allow a proper representation of the people of Indiana.

I thank the gentleman.

Mr. BOULTER. I have known the distinguished gentleman from Texas for some time now, having compaigned during the same period of time. The gentleman is talking about a certain naiveness. I think that naiveness is shared by the American people, that the American people have always understood our process to be that even if you won by one vote, majority rule holds, the majority wins. and I think that is what you are talking about.

Mr. ARMEY. I thank the gentleman for that. And it is not naiveness. It is faith in the Constitution that this land adopted that makes it great, and I want that faith honored in the House.

Mr. MONSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOULTER. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Utah.

Mr. MONSON. I thank the gentleman and appreciate the gentleman from Texas yielding this time.

Mr. Speaker, I am frightened by the precedent that I see being set here, frightened for reasons that, having served as a State chief election officer myself, and having gotten to know those from other States who were in similar positions, recognizing in them the desire to be accurate in what they do, and knowing that that is foremost in their minds, and not a desire to be partisan in the work that they do but foremost to be accurate, I am frightened by the precedent that we would allow to be set here if we proceed in the manner that we have been proceeding, that a person that has been duly certified by the chief election officer of his State would not be seated as a Member of this House.

I am also frightened from the standpoint that, having gone through a very close election myself, I can see the possibility that if that were to happen to me again I might end up in the same situation. I could have easily ended up this time. I think probably the only reason I did not was that I was not running against an incumbent Member of this body. I ran against a person who had not previously held a position in this House and because it was in that situation it was not pursued to the extent that this election is being pursued.

So it frightens me as an individual that having won the most votes in my election I might come to Washington and not be given the seat that I have rightfully won.

We cannot allow this to go forward. We must act immediately to correct this situation and to allow Mr. McIntyre to be seated.

Since January 3, several of my Democrat colleagues have come to me and have indicated to me that the action that we took on that day to seat Mr. STALLINGS of Idaho was right and asked if I agreed with that. I most certainly did agree that that action was right and it is also right to seat Mr. McIntyre.

We should do it immediately and not waste any more time on this matter.

I thank the gentleman from Texas for yielding.

Mr. BOULTER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH of New Hampshire. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOULTER. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from New Hampshire.

Mr. SMITH of New Hampshire. I thank the gentleman from Texas for yielding. I also rise to express my support for Congressman McIntyre. I use that term deliberately.

Also to express my outrage as to what has happened in the past month in this body. As the gentleman said, I come from the State of New Hampshire, a small State with only two of us represented here in this Congress.

Mr. Speaker, I would find myself almost wishing that I could be in Mr. McIntyre's shoes because I pity the majority in this House of Representatives who made this decision if they had to face the constituents in my State if an individual were to be elected and not seated in this body. We are playing with the U.S. Constitution.

I have seen decisions rendered in small towns. We have town meetings in New Hampshire and I have seen critical decisions pass by one vote in my own hometown of Tuftonboro many times. It happens. It is democracy at its best. It is the way democracy is supposed to work.

One of the shocking things that is coming about from this whole matter is that it is put into political terms. It should not and it is not a political issue. It is an issue dealing with the U.S. Constitution, and I say here and now to my colleagues and to you, Mr. Speaker, that the U.S. Constitution means more than Rick McIntyre, it means more than Mr. McCloskey, it means more than the 435 people who are now seated in this body.

It means more than the President of the United States and it means that the Constitution should be upheld, pure and simple.

You gentlemen on the opposite side of the aisle, we know you have the power, we know you have the power. I call on you in the interest of that Constitution, in the interest of the sacredness of that document, to reach down into your consciences next week, come back to the floor of this House and vote what you know in your heart is the right decision as the Republican party did earlier this month in seating Mr. STALLINGS because that was the right decision.

Seat Mr. McIntyre. He was elected.

This issue is not on the counting of votes. We have been talking about vote counting here over the last 45 minutes or so. However, it is not the counting of votes that is the issue. The Constitution, let us give some credit to the Founding Fathers; the Constitution, the Founding Fathers knew what they were doing.

They had a clause in there about this matter. But Mr. McIntyre was certified, certified by the secretary of state of Indiana.

In 1980 I went through a recount in my State. A Democratic secretary of state; I lost that recount and I lost the recount fair and square. My secretary of state, a Democrat, is a fair and honorable man and I resent the implication in some of the remarks made across the aisle that because the secretary of state of Indiana happens to have an "R" next to his name that that somehow invalidates this election.

We can seat and we should seat Rick McIntyre today. We should have seated him on January 3 and we still can go through the process of a recount which the Constitution provides for. If that recount overturns that decision, we can change that decision.

The process is wrong. We are playing with the Constitution and I am telling you, ladies and gentlemen, the American people are watching, they are watching.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Texas for yielding.

Mr. BOULTER. The gentleman from New Hampshire made an interesting point about the Republican secretary of state.

Now let us not forget that that Republican secretary of state himself certified, I believe, nine Democrats from the State of Indiana, several of whom had miscounts or mathematical errors in the tabulation of their votes. But they were seated by this body as was Mr. STALLINGS.

I thank the gentleman from New Hampshire.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. GALLO. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

As the freshman whip, I have listened to this debate, I have watched our freshman Members and others articulate this issue. When I look at the overall impact that has transpired on January 3, where in fact by law, by constitutional law, everything was met in dealing with Rick McIntyre's election, the secretary of state did authorize and certify that individual as a winner; when we go back to the district I think one of the most telling things that my colleagues have described is our young people; when we talk about young people getting involved in the process and understanding the process and then we have to go back and try to explain what has happened in this particular instance.

Mr. Speaker, I have never seen anything like this happen before.

Now, in the State of New Jersey we have had very close elections on many occasions. The last close election was for the Governor of that State. It was won by 1,700 votes. And, yes, there were some recounts. But not only was that upheld but the Democrat who was representing the Democratic Party and who comes from this House, Congressman FLORIO, did not contest the secretary of state when that was issued.

The precedent has been on the other side of this issue, it has not been on the side that the Democrats have stated.

I take exception with my colleagues in, specifically, what happened on January 3. I think it was a tragedy to have Rich McIntyre and his family put through the humiliation of stepping aside when in fact he had met all of the criteria, including the verification and certification from the secretary of state of Indiana's Eighth District.

So with that, I too stand here, Mr. Speaker, objecting to the blatant arrogance of the majority party in this House. And at the same time I would use this time to call upon them; and I have had an opportunity to serve and work with my colleagues on the majority side in the State of New Jersey and I know we have disagreements when we talk about political philosophy or whether we talk about a certain bill, and we argue those disagreements; but when it is the preservation of the Constitution whether it be the Federal Constitution or a State's constitution, I can tell you, my colleagues on the Democratic side, never try to perpetrate what has been perpetrated in this House.

For that I have a day that was supposed to be one of the most rewarding, exciting days, January 3 and it has a black mark next to it because of that injustice.

I thank the gentleman.

Mr. BOULTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. SLAUGHTER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Texas for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, it is wrong and a poor precedent for this House in the absence of fraud to refuse to seat a candidate who has been certified by the election authorities of this State as the successful candidate for Congress.

As to the Eighth District of Indiana, there is no allegation of fraud in this case. Mr. McIntyre has been certified by the proper election authorities of his State. And until the decision of such authorities should be changed by their action or a change be ordered by a court of competent jurisdiction, neither of which has occurred, Mr. McIntyre is an elected Member of this Congress.

Mr. McIntyre is not only entitled to his seat in this House, but the people of the Eighth District of Indiana who do not have a Representative here in the present circumstances are entitled to have their elected Member of Congress seated in this body, voting in this body, and acting on all legislative matters on their behalf.

As a matter of constitutional right, as a matter of fairness, this House should proceed to seat Mr. McIntyre to represent the Eighth District of Indiana.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. BOULTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. LIGHTFOOT. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, we have talked about a lot of things here over the last several days and weeks that this has carried on. Our colleague was talking a moment ago of addressing a class of youngsters, a school history class; and I think as adults one of the things we try to do is to set an example for our children to follow.

I think fairness and honesty are two things that have to be a very composite part of that.

What we are seeing, in my opinion, starting to develop in the McIntyre situation is a carryover from the campaign, and that is one of confusion and polarization of the people. Remarks that were made on the floor this morning, things that we are seeing in the popular press, is a deliberate attempt, in my opinion, to confuse the people of this country and to polarize them against each other. For crying out loud, if we ever need people to work together, this is the time we need cooperation and not polarization.

In Mr. Webster's dictionary, if you look up the term "fairness," a couple of the definitions under it are: "Free of blemishes or stains; free of favoritism or bias; impartial; just to all parties; equitable; consistent with rules, logic or ethics."

Nothing in the McIntyre situation fits any of those descriptions of the word "fairness."

We have a practical joke that we use in our part of the country on some unsuspecting soul; we call it taking him on a "snipe hunt," where you take the individual out and put them down by a culvert, in a road ditch, and they are supposed to hold a sack open in the middle of the night while we go back to run the snipes into it. And, of course, everyone else goes home, because there is no such thing as a snipe.

I would suggest that the leadership on the other side of the aisle is taking the people in the Eighth District of Indiana on a snipe hunt. And today they are sitting in an empty ditch with an empty sack, waiting for something to run into it which does not exist.

I think it is time that we finished with this, that we put Mr. McIntyre in his seat. He has met all the legal qualifications; he has won his election; he has been certified; he is the proper age, he is a resident of the United States of America, it is time that we get on to the business of this House.

Mr. BOULTER. Mr. Speaker, what we have been talking about this morning are beliefs that are deeply held by the American people. Beliefs that are expressed in the little document to our country, the U.S. Constitution.

This, Mr. Speaker, is not an issue that pits or should pit Republicans versus Democrats. This is an issue which I would hope that many, many fairminded Democrats, with whom I intend to work with closely in the 99th Congress, will gain an appreciation for.

Frankly, we are concerned that many of our colleagues on the other side of the aisle have not heard the truth; that they do not understand the real facts. We believe that upon getting an understanding of the facts in this case that those Democrats and certainly there is a majority of them who do believe in the democratic process will join with us in seating Rick McIntyre.

The principle that we are talking about I think has been very eloquently spoken of by Congressman DICK ARMEY. I had a similar situation, running against an incumbent, an incumbent who I thought I would make a better Congressman than.

I knew that that decision was not going to be made by me; it was going to be made by the people in the 13th Congressional District of Texas, the people in Wichita Falls, in Pampa, in Borger, in Amarillo, and I knew I was going to have a tough race, but I always believed that absent some fraud, that if I got 50 percent of that vote plus 1—and frankly, I thought my race might be so tough that that is what it might come down to—I knew that I would be seated in this House.

So we are denying the principle of one man, one vote; the principle of majority rule. We are setting aside the clause in the U.S. Constitution which says that the States shall determine their own election processes.

Most of all, the people of the Eighth Congressional District in Indiana, for the 28th day, are being held hostage to this unfair situation created and trumped up by the Democratic leadership. It is nothing but trial by myth. The election is over and the recount is over.

I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, as he finishes up I just want to say to the gentleman that I congratulate him on taking the special order and handling it in the manner that he handled it.

This is the first time that he has done something of this type on the floor; he did it very, very well, and I want to congratulate him not only on the subject matter and the people who spoke as a part of his special order, but also in the manner in which he conducted himself in the special order on the floor.

BALANCED BUDGET, VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION, AND IRS REGULATIONS

Mr. SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MICA] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Speaker, I take the floor to discuss two or three matters that are of importance to me and I would like to share with my colleagues. One deals with the balanced budget problems, the other with the Veterans' Administration situation in this Nation and in Miami in particular. The third, with IRS regulations.

First, I would like to say that this past year has been a year where we have had discussions about balancing the budget. I have no delusions about how we can balance the budget, and I do not have a solution nor do I think anyone in this Chamber has an immediate solution.

I think we have seen, with an administration that came into office espousing a belief in a balanced budget and ending up with a $200 billion a year deficit each year for 4 years, the difficulty in trying to balance the budget.

But I know and I think my colleagues know that the time of reckoning is here; we will have to approach this issue. It is an important issue and it is an issue that I think deserves every bit of attention.

With that, I would like to indicate that I have introduced as my first package of bills in this session, legislation aimed toward focusing attention on balancing the budget.

The first bill would be a phase-in period, requiring that we move toward a balanced budget over 3 years. I would be the first to say that 3 years is not a magic number; it would be 4 or 5, but I think we need the commitment. I believe everyone knows that we cannot do it overnight.

I introduced that bill, incidentally, the first day of the first session 6 years ago when I was elected. It did not pass. I feel that if we had made that commitment then, we might not be in the situation that we are in today; in fact, indeed, we would not.

The second bill would require the President of the United States to submit a balanced budget each year to the Congress. Now some might say that this is an exercise in futility, but I think it would be a worthy exercise, and one that we have discussed many times in this Chamber.

The President has said he wants a balanced budget; we say we would like a balanced budget, but we have never seen on paper what a balanced budget would mean or would do. At very least, it would give us a document of priorities to make a judgment as to the size of the cuts and the depth of the cuts, the adjustments or tax increases or whatever revenue changes might be necessary.

The third would be a final approach, if all else fails, that would require some type of constitutional amendment that would provide for a balanced budget except in times of national emergency or war.

We would, of course, have discussion, as we have had in the past, on the tenets of any constitutional amendment, but I think those three approaches at least shall focus some attention, not only on the rhetoric but on the reality of the balanced budget dilemma in this Nation.

Another area that I have been concerned with for the past 6 years is our veterans health care in this Nation. I know there has been a great deal of discussion about adequate funding for our medical facilities.

We had a situation that received national attention that started out with reports in south Florida of the very high death rate at the cardiac surgical care unit in the Miami Veterans Hospital.

I would like to say at the onset that to this very date there is no proof in hand that there is a problem in the cardiac surgical care unit in Miami. That that published information led to a VA review panel going to Miami to look at the situation and closing down the facility until a determination is made.

It also led to a decision by the Veterans' Administration to review the VA Cardiac Surgical Care Program nationwide. I think both were appropriate actions, but I think we should withhold judgment until the review team, composed of three cardiac surgeons, reports in the next few weeks on the situation in Miami.

To that end, I have discussed with the chairman of the Hospital Subcommittee, Congressman EDGAR of Pennsylvania, the need for a hearing here in Washington to review the results of the investigations and reviews that are going on in Miami.

I am pleased that Chairman EDGAR has agreed to hold an open hearing as soon as the review team returns from Miami and presents its report. I think this will give us some indication and we can put on the public record exactly what the situation is in Miami.

I would say this: The fact that we are having a hearing is not a prejudgment that there is or is not a problem in Miami or in any other VA hospital. We are simply saying this: Throughout the Nation and particularly in Florida there have been major allegations in newspapers and across the media that problems exist. A team is reviewing this situation. A national review is taking place. We would like to have a hearing and set forth on the public record, yes, there is a problem and these are the steps that are being taken to correct it. Or, no, there is not a problem and veterans and the public should not be concerned. But in any event, the hearing has been agreed to by Congressman EDGAR. It will take place in the next month, maybe 6 weeks and we will have the information for the American public.

Lastly, I would like to mention an issue that has been coming to my attention in greater numbers almost every day and it may seem like a minor issue, but hundreds of thousands of Americans are affected by it and this is the subject of IRS regulations pertaining to tax deductions for automobiles.

Under legislation this House passed last year and incidentally most of us supported, regulations were issued that were somewhat onerous, in fact, very onerous and burdensome for the average American who tries to keep track of the mileage on the automobile for appropriate tax deductions.

Congressman ROEMER of Louisiana and I have cosponsored legislation. We have, with his leadership, received support of over 100 Members of the House to repeal this legislation and to say in effect that we, the American Government, the Internal Revenue Service, recognize that as a daily part of our business society, people do use automobiles, should be allowed some tax consideration and there should be a reasonable way to approach this.

So I have introduced legislation that would repeal these regulations so that we can move forward with a more reasonable approach. I think really that is the intent of the other 100-plus Members who have cosponsored this legislation.

So, with that, I intend to continue to try to report on the progress of our balanced budget legislation, the VA problems that we have and other legislation that comes before the House and hopefully we can have a successful 99th Congress.

A CONGRESSMAN'S VIEWS OF SOUTH AFRICA: SEEKING A PROPER PUBLIC POLICY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GUNDERSON] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Speaker, early this year on a bright Sunday morning, I found myself visiting with the owner of a medium-sized dairy farm outside Johannesburg, South Africa. With my background and interest in dairy agriculture, the opportunity to compare dairy support systems in different parts of the world should have been a great one indeed. However, as my view grew to include a distant hut, obviously lacking in electricity and plumbing, and lauded by the farmer as black servant housing, I began to realize the two contrasting societies functioning within this country—white versus black; power versus oppression; reform versus injustice; progress versus despair.

Certainly, South Africa is a country in need of change. Our challenge is how best to influence that change.

Recently, I joined three other Members of Congress on a visit to South Africa and Zimbabwe as guests of the South Africa Foundation. This foundation is an independent organization, financed entirely by private enterprise, which encourages a more informed understanding of South Africa through research, information, and dialog. With the issue of South Africa disinvestment becoming one of the top foreign policy issues of this session of Congress, the need to obtain as much insight as possible almost demanded participating in the trip.

As I left the States on this journey, I must admit to apprehension. The troubles in this faraway land were obvious, and I wondered whether the situation presented us would be comprehensive and unbiased. Further, I hoped that I could adequately respond to this newly acquired knowledge. Certainly a need exists in our national debate for thoughtful, informed, and constructive proposals to meet the moral challenges confronting us in South Africa.

Initially, thoughts upon my return were equally mixed. In South Africa, I had witnessed firsthand a country advanced, yet primitive. Natives—black and white—seemed defensive, convinced they were maligned either by their own country or world opinion, respectively. There simultaneously exists in this rich country hope and despair. The consensus believed the country was on a pendulum for reform and change that would never swing back. The real questions seemed to center on the form, substance, and timing of such change, for a time bomb of hopelessness and anger is ticking away among some elements of the black population. A crisis does exist. Whether it be a crisis of moral indignation at laws, customs, and living standards imposed upon the black community or it be a crisis of potential economic ruin and bloodshed from riot, it is difficult to determine. Perhaps it is both depending on emerging influences.

South Africa is an intensely complicated society. It is not the melting pot experienced in the United States. Rather, it is a fragmented population comprised of whites, blacks, coloureds, and Asians. The white population is divided between English and Afrikaans-speaking people of varied historical backgrounds and political philosophies. The black population is divided into four linguistic groupings: the Nguni, the Sotho, the Venda, and the Shangaan-Tsonga. The tribal ancestry of blacks has become most important for it is the basis upon which the government now decides to which "homeland" they are assigned.

The complicated society is even more obvious in its laws and customs regarding people of different races. For the typical American unfamiliar with South African politics, it is almost too monumental to comprehend. Fundamentally there exist two sets of laws: One of freedom for whites; one of submission to government control for others.

The most obvious element of this practice is known as apartheid. Apartheid, by definition, is separate existence for people of different races. It has been the official government policy since the late 1940's. Since that time, the government has passed or implemented numerous policies with the same concept in mind. "Pass laws" require the blacks and other nonwhites to restrict their movement from the rural areas into the cities.

"Influx control" is the system by which the movement of blacks is regulated. Each black is assigned a reference book which must be in their possession at all times. This book specifically designates the areas in which they can travel, thus regulating the movement of rural blacks into the cities.

Since 1977, following the Soweto riots, the government has used "emergency powers" to prohibit any meetings which would lead to breach of peace. This concept can be used by the government to prohibit any public meeting of blacks, especially those called to discuss political strategies. Laws on the books for some time, but predicted to be repealed by the Parliament this session, include the Immorality and the Mixed Marriages Act. These laws prohibit sexual relations or marriage between people of different races.

Finally, two government policies cause most of the recent conflict and controversy. First, it has been government policy for some time to cause the "forced removal" of blacks away from their present homes into the designated "homelands" often far away from previous living areas. By this process, the government actually tries to strip blacks of their South African nationality, thus permanently eliminating their citizenship and the potential for political participation in the government of South Africa. A second government action causing great worldwide concern is detention without trial. Following such detention for some black labor leaders, demonstrations began at the South African Embassy here in Washington.

Obviously, advocates for reform consequently focus their energy challenging blatant social injustices. At present, political equality is at best a dream. The new constitution implemented recently is a clear case in point as it grants political rights to the Asian and coloured populations. A house of parliament has been created for each. Blacks have remained conspicuously left out.

The most disturbing element of a visit such as ours is that one comes to the conclusion that changes other than political opportunity do seem most important now. In stark terms, it can be said that South Africa is one of the few places in the world where poverty is state-created through the apartheid system.

One black leader, wishing to remain anonymous, told us the worst element of the apartheid system is that it is destroying the black family as men are forced to leave their families to seek employment far from home. For example, in the mining industry, only 3 percent of the black laborers are allowed by law to live with their families near the site of employment.

REFORM IN SOUTH AFRICA

Surely the need for reform in South Africa is obvious and undeniable. It is important to note that this need for change is recognized by both whites and blacks in South Africa. Recently, six different business and industry organizations, from the traditionally conservative Afrikaanse Handelsinstituut to the black National Fricanederation of Chambers of Commerce, issued a joint statement calling on the government to enact a program of legislative reform. This reform package ranges from universal citizenship and meaningful political participation for blacks to an end to the forced removals. At this point, it is far too early to anticipate the government's reaction. Most analysts also project that the recent support for the new constitution by 65 percent of the white population verifies their commitment to change. While the new constitution does not go as far as Americans believe it should, it clearly moves toward that direction by bringing coloured and Asians into full political participation for the first time. While not said openly, the understanding among many South Africans is that the development of three houses of parliament in the new constitution is done in a way to allow for the creation of a fourth black house of parliament in the future. Thus, even for the most conservative people in South Africa, the road to full political participation for all citizens seems etched in their future.

The debate over reform in South Africa at times seems misdirected both among its own citizens and the world community. Those concerned seem determined to debate both the intended direction and the necessary end. However, we cannot anticipate answers until we begin the process of further reform. Certainly we, in America, would prefer one house of parliament, with all races given equal participation. But recognizing the long historical and social perspectives behind this country's problems, let's simply begin the process of further reform, come what may.

From an American point of view, we may be tempted to equate reform in South Africa with the story of the "Three Little Pigs." We would like to huff and puff and blow the laws down, and then all would be good. Unfortunately, it is not quite so simple.

As Americans, we should be committed to three goals. First, we should want change. Second, we should insist upon peaceful change. Third, we should want a strong economy remaining after the change has evolved. The simple realization of the huge commitment which will be needed from the government in the social service sector alone explains the crucial need for a strong economy to remain a part of South Africa.

It is tempting for Americans to support an immediate revolution. Our moral ethic can almost justify this type of immediate response. However, a thoughtful analysis of the situation will indicate the folly of such thoughts. First and foremost, the black population is not united. Due partly to government laws prohibiting public meetings for blacks and due partly to the different tribal backgrounds, there does not exist a single leader or single set of goals held by all blacks in South Africa. As evidenced by the recent problems Senator KENNEDY faced with some blacks, there is a growing breakdown between younger and older blacks.

As the young blacks are becoming polarized, unfortunately many young whites are becoming equally adamant in the protection of their present rights and benefits. Thus, one must realize that an attempt at revolution by the blacks would be bloody with major loss of life on both sides. And chances are at this time that any such effort would ill benefit any reform intentions. The simple fact is that the South African Army is the strongest on the continent. Unless the United States and other countries are willing to become involved militarily in such a conflict, the chances of success for the black population are remote indeed.

As one considers the elements of successful reform or revolution, we also consider the national agenda facing the government and people of South Africa. Perhaps no industrial country in the world faces a more costly social program than South Africa. Basic social policy dictates large government expenditures for housing, education, nutrition, and health care. Any effort to equate the standards and investment in these areas for blacks with those presently enjoyed by whites would cost literally billions of dollars. No government then, black or white run, can even begin to meet the social needs alone without a thriving economic base from which to raise its revenues. This point cannot be ignored.

Recent events throughout the African continent also come into play. The continent is suffering from its third consecutive year of drought. We have all witnessed the stark examples of starvation and famine on our television. While much of this is due to the weather itself, there must be a realization that most countries in Africa have also mismanaged their farm programs. South Africa is the most productive agriculture state on the continent. It is essential to the basic elements of life that this system not be destroyed in a bloody revolution.

Another essential consideration for Americans viewing the situation in South Africa is that while free enterprise and democracy are not necessarily coincidental, unfortunately most native blacks equate the free enterprise system with South Africa's colonization and the political repression that followed. Subsequently, most blacks logically equate reform with socialism from both an economic and governmental perspective. Ours is a unique opportunity in that we can show that true freedom may exist in both a democratic government and a free enterprise system.

The question again, then, is not reform, but rather when and how that reform should occur.

As reform occurs, there exist numerous factors by which the United States and the world community can judge that change. These factors would include:

Repeal of the Mixed Marriages and Immorality Acts;

An end to forced removals and the homelands process;

An end to influx control and pass laws;

An end to detention without trial;

The legalization of all political parties.

Frankly, change can occur in all of these areas without any change or threat to the present power structure. Peaceful progress and reform would also require the creation of structures in which blacks can rationally discuss and form opinions, for the blacks are justifiably hesitant to accept any alternatives in which they cannot participate. Peaceful reform is commensurate, and I suspect there will be more compromise than is presently anticipated.

In the meantime, I again reiterate that the world community can be helpful in the long-term reform and progress that must occur. Governments and social organizations can and should join with the South African Government in common, if separate, investments in the black South African's future. Such investments must occur in education (presently more than six times as much per capita is spent for white education), in housing (reform cannot wait for political change), and black health care and nutrition (high infant mortality and starvation in some of the homelands).

Unfortunately, we must recognize that the comprehensive change and reform we are seeking will take time. Senator KENNEDY, in his speech in Johannesburg, said, "I suggest this form of progress only avoids the decisive issue—which is full and equal citizenship—not in a space of generations, but in a reasonable span of years."

We all know that governments, anywhere, are not the compelling factor in change. South Africa is no different. There the government will only respond to what it believes is the wish of its white constituents. However, in South Africa, business is and will be the compelling factor in change.

Presently, South Africa is the most industrialized country in the continent. It is both a first and third world country. Yet, its economy provides the best hope for true reform with true progress of any element in South Africa. Almost all agree that by the year 2050, blacks can control the country simply through economic progress. Some would rightly suggest that even today, if organized, blacks could stop working and bring the country to a halt. It is their lack of unity which prevents this.

South African business and economic leaders claim the growth essential for their economic needs calls for the creation of roughly 250,000 new jobs each year. Whites also recognize that there simply are not enough whites to accommodate the rapidly expanding economy. Thus, it is the black population which must be educated and trained to accept many of the new careers which will exist.

As mentioned earlier, in many ways, South African business is the leader among whites for reform. They are pressing their own government for reform and are the ones who led the efforts to allow black labor unions. In many cases, unlike the States, most of the vocational training is done by business, not the government. Without any mandate from the government, mines and other industries are investing in both specialized and general liberal arts education for their black workers. Recent years have also seen a significant growth in black salaries as many businesses accept the concept of equal pay for equal work. This does not justify the inadequate pay of the past, but it does suggest business thinking in much of the country has entered the modern era.

ROLE OF THE UNITED STATES

None of this, thus far, suggests how the United States should respond to the moral dilemma we face in South Africa. Our leadership in the free world almost compels America to develop some response to areas in the world where repression exists of this magnitude. Yet, the burning and difficult question for Americans is how best to be of assistance in achieving the reforms we seek. The U.S. Ambassador to South Africa put this dilemma in proper perspective recently when he said:

> Let everyone take note that there is no constituency for racism and apartheid in respectable American politics. As we enter an intense debate about U.S. policy toward South Africa, it is as important for Americans as it is for South Africans to keep this fact in mind. I remember only too vividly a dark period in our not-too-distant past when anticommunism ran the risk of being labeled—and libeled—as being "soft on communism." We do not need a repeat of this sordid chapter with respect to our policy toward South Africa. The real issue is not who is "soft on racism," but how the United States can best use its influence to advance the delicately interdependent process of peaceful change in South Africa itself, and peaceful change in the relations between South Africa and her neighbors.

Honorable people within the United States can differ on the means by which we can best achieve the reforms we seek. Strong moral statements of indignation may ultimately soothe the conscience; however, I am convinced they do nothing for South Africa nor her people. Allow me a couple of examples. First, I had the unique coincidence of being in South Africa at the same time as Senator KENNEDY's much heralded trip. While everything the Senator said was true and legitimate, the manner in which it was said and received may have only hurt the cause he championed. There is no question that his words served to polarize the white community.

Even whites in the liberal Progressive Party felt the Senator was too extreme, and his efforts in the black community only worked to polarize this element mainly between the young and old. When Bishop Tutu is forced to cancel KENNEDY's speech to the black community in Tutu's hometown of Soweto, the problems caused become all too apparent. Second, it is the conclusion of many in South Africa that the strong moral rhetoric of the Carter administration against South Africa may be the greatest element in the National Party's strong election in 1981.

There is certainly room for debate as to the success or chance of success for the policy of "Constructive Engagement." To the blacks, it seems inadequate because the strong moral statements of indignation are not there. Yet, there are many examples which do hold out hope for this policy. The South African Government is negotiating with its black neighboring states. Regional violence has been reduced. Except for the debate over Cuban troops in Angola, the Namibian settlement now seems possible. The internal situation in many ways seems to be improving as evidenced by the chambers of commerce joint statement for reform. "Constructive Engagement" needs to be judged, not by its intended direction but, rather, on the progress it is achieving.

Certainly, as leaders of the free world, America must take the lead in any policy of pressure that is adopted. Morally, as individuals, we must continue to press both here at home and in the world community for change in South Africa. We must realize that change will not occur without pressure, and we need to find ways for that pressure to occur from within its own constituency. Some would suggest that Africaaner today is even more committed to maintaining his economic progress and standard of living than to an ideology of apartheid.

All of this leads us to the immediate question of disinvestment. Certainly this will be one of the first foreign policy issues faced by the 99th Congress. Because South African law makes economic sabotage a crime, most blacks are hesitant to even discuss the issue of disinvestment, say nothing of advocating such action. Many in America seem committed to using the issue of disinvestment as a purity test for one's commitment to civil rights. The recent letter signed by myself and 36 other Republicans to the South African Ambassador has heightened interest in the issue of possible disinvestment or sanctions in the future.

If disinvestment would bring about immediate, peaceful, and total change to South Africa, I would be the first to support it; unfortunately, the facts suggest otherwise. In 1980, the United States placed an embargo on commercial business with the Soviet Union. When we realized that such action hurt our people without making any perceptible change in Soviet policies, the embargo was lifted. Let us not make the same mistake twice.

American investment in South Africa constitutes about 6 percent of the African gross national product. Of an economically active 7.5 million blacks, American companies employ 120,000 blacks. Unfortunately, if American interests are withdrawn, our investments would be promptly picked up by German, French, English, and Japanese investors. The cultural and traditional relationship between Europe and South Africa is strong. It does no good for us to pull out if our investments are retained by someone else.

Americans should again recognize the simple economic theory that the little man pays the price of the high roller. Assume our disinvestment would burden South Africa and immediately realize who would be hurt the most—the whites who own the companies or the blacks with the manual labor jobs? I suspect if an economic turndown occurred, the blacks would suffer the most.

An additional concern in this regard focuses upon South Africa's neighbors. Most Americans are committed to the success of new black majority countries such as Zimbabwe. Yet, 80 percent of Zimbabwe's trade is either with or through South Africa. Imagine the impact they would feel if total disinvestment occurred.

Few Americans can or should simply accept, however, the realization that disinvestment may not work, it may do more harm than good and, thus, decide we are helpless in changing the political and social structure of South Africa.

The head of the Black Chamber of Commerce, Mr. S.M. Monsuenyane, provides a clue to more positive action by Americans when he says:

I believe that instead of putting the accent on disinvestment, consideration should be given to alternatives such as giving direct financial support to black health and educational projects; or the channeling of foreign investments into worthwhile black business activities. This is certainly one of the ways in which concerned Americans could help to position blacks to become a viable part of the country's free enterprise economy.

If one assumes, and I believe rightly so, that in South Africa, business is ahead of the government and American business is ahead of South African business, there may be options for us to take in a positive and influential way. Rather than accepting the concept of disinvestment, or doing nothing, we should adopt the concept of "conditional investment." The Congress should adopt, and the President sign, a bill which allows American investment to continue providing that certain human rights conditions are achieved within a 5-year period. These conditions needing change would include those mentioned before:

Repeal of the Mixed Marriages and Immorality Acts;

An end to forced removals and the homelands process;

An end to influx control and pass laws;

An end to detention without trial; and

The legalization of all political parties.

American business has led the effort toward progress in human rights within the South African economic sector. Presently, American companies in South Africa adhere to the Sullivan principles. These principles are guidelines providing equal opportunity for all employees regardless of race. We may want to mandate that all American companies must do so. In addition, it is the American companies that have financed such educational efforts as the development, construction, and operation of a private commercial high school in Soweto.

At the end of the 5-year period, we would require the President, through the Secretary of State, to report to Congress on the progress made. If substantial progress has been achieved, American investment could continue. If not, then the administration would be directed to implement the methods by which disinvestment of American interests would occur.

Will it work? No one knows. But, based on numerous discussions with both black and white leaders, I believe this is the most positive step America could take to produce our desired results. It would not directly mandate anything upon the South African Government, but it would clearly take a strong moral position on behalf of our values for a truly free society. And, it would signal to the government and people of South Africa that the choice was theirs. If they desired the continuation of American investment, they could choose to implement the abovenamed human rights reforms.

Beyond this, America can take a more positive step in regard to the political rights of all people in South Africa. Presently, our Government has various sanctions against the Government of South Africa. We have taken steps to make it difficult for them to borrow from the International Monetary Fund. We have no mutual defense agreements, nor do we allow the sale of military weapons. It would seem that a logical and hopefully worthy incentive for reform could occur. We, as a Government, could adopt as policy our willingness to change, revise, or eliminate various sanctions against their government when all people in South Africa were given full political participation in their government.

Finally, if our goal is reform and progress, there exist some major needs that cannot wait for political decisions either at home or abroad. Presently, we provide $10 million annually direct to the black people of South Africa to assist in their struggles for progress—from education to political reform. This must continue.

But, in addition, and within our own economic constraints, a high priority must be placed upon additional funding for housing, education, nutrition, and health care. These are essential from a human rights and a moral perspective. We must equip the black population with the abilities if we choose to help them obtain full participation in their society.

I believe there is no unique invention called the "American Dream." Rather, it burns in the hearts and minds of people all over the world who yearn for the chance to be free and the opportunity to chart their own destiny. From that perspective, we can be the light of freedom throughout the world. And, based upon my visit through this rich yet tragic land, we can light that candle of hope for all—black or white, Asian or coloured. With the policies suggested above, we can make more than moral statements. We can be positive instruments for change.

VOLUNTARY NATIONAL YOUTH SERVICE ACT

(Mr. PANETTA asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

● Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce legislation designed to encourage local voluntary youth service programs which are just beginning to develop across the country. I am very pleased to be joined by Representative JAMES JEFFORDS in sponsoring this important measure.

These innovative local youth service programs seek to tap our country's vast reservoir of young people and channel their energies toward the fulfillment of unmet human, social, and environmental needs in our communities. As a nation, we are committed to providing assistance for our elderly, ill and disabled citizens; caring for our children; conserving and protecting our environment and our natural resources; rebuilding our cities; educating our young people and helping educationally disadvantaged adults. Many valuable and worthwhile government programs exist to help us reach these and other important social goals. Yet, the last few years have seen a growing realization that government alone cannot provide all the answers. As we move into the end of the 20th century, we must draw on all the resources available to us; we must use imagination and innovation. I believe that voluntary youth service is one of the most promising of our alternatives to meet these challenges, a vast natural resource which we have barely begun to tap.

By identifying opportunities in local nonprofit social service organizations, hospitals, nursing homes, parks, schools, and neighborhoods where the efforts of young people can make a difference, local youth service programs offer our country tremendous benefits. Not only do such programs provide important services to their communities, but they impart lasting personal benefits to those who participate. Personal growth and self-esteem, a sense of participation in one's community as well as useful on-the-job training and experience are valuable products of public service. The fact is that public service can have unique and invaluable results in terms of personal growth of its individual participants—growth which reflects back on the society of which those individuals are a part.

Our young people represent our most precious resource, our investment in America's future. We cannot allow an entire generation to become dispirited and demoralized. It is shocking that 18.8 percent of American youth are currently unemployed and it is a national tragedy that over 350,000, 42.1 percent, of our black teenagers are jobless. Public service can serve as a barrier against the aimlessness and despair these high rates of unemployment can foster, in addition to making constructive use of idle energies and talents. It is unacceptable—economically, morally, politically, and socially—to allow the vitality and creativity of these young people to go to waste.

The legislation that Representative JEFFORDS and I are introducing today—the Voluntary National Youth Service Act—would provide the necessary incentives for the development of a truly broad-based program of voluntary youth service in our Nation's local communities. By providing matching Federal grants to State and local voluntary youth service programs, this legislation would encourage young people ages 17–24 to volunteer to serve in local nonprofit, social service or government agencies that meet important human, social, or environmental needs. Under these programs, participants would volunteer full time for a minimum 6 months of service with an approved sponsor organization.

In order to be eligible for a Federal grant, youth service programs must provide participants with stipends, housing, food or other in-kind assistance ranging in value from 50 to 110 percent of the Federal minimum wage. The State and local programs may also provide participants with postservice benefits—including educational assistance or matching salary grants for postservice employment. Total benefits would range between the equivalent of 80 to 160 percent of the Federal minimum wage. The sponsor organizations who contribute free training or who contribute funds toward their volunteers' living allowances will be given preference over those sponsors who do not contribute to the program.

While the Federal grants would be adminstered nationally by the Secretary of Health and Human Services, the overall focus of this legislation is at the local level. My legislation does not force a Federal program upon unwilling States and localities. Instead, this measure would lend important Federal support to locally initiated programs—programs directly responding to local needs and situations.

In my view, it is essential to allow the States and localities the flexibility necessary to develop innovative programs that encourage the maximum participation of young people in meeting the needs of their communities. The State and local programs are free to determine the exact combination of living allowances and postservice benefits that would best encourage youth service in their locality. This legislation also contains protections for salaried employees from replacement by voluntary youth service participants. Finally, under this legislation, individuals, businesses, foundations, and other groups can contribute time and money to local youth service programs. The key to the success of a voluntary youth service program is not only to enhance the service ethic in this country but to energize local communities behind these projects.

Already 14 States and 13 localities have seized this potential for youth service. The Washington State Service Corps, the San Francisco Conservation Corps, the City Volunteer Corps of New York, and the California Conservation Corps are all examples of innovative local efforts to focus the energies of young people toward meaningful constructive public service. The Governor of New York, Mario Cuomo, has also taken the initiative on the idea of youth service by proposing an Empire State Service Corps to the New York Legislature. Most recently, the State of Minnesota has begun to explore the possibility of a youth service initiative. With these and other initiatives underway at the State and local levels, I believe now is the time for the Federal Government to lend its support to these programs.

Mr. Speaker, there are those who would claim that these are worthwhile programs, with worthwhile goals, but that the Federal Government simply cannot afford the additional costs of such a program. I am sensitive to these concerns; however, the reality is that the long-term societal costs of not supporting these programs far exceed the costs of this legislation. The cost to our society of youth crime, of dependence on public assistance, and of the wasted talents and energies of idle youth are tremendous burdens on our country. An internal Justice Department study has estimated that the annual cost of youth crime alone is $5 billion. More importantly, however, studies done on the cost-effectiveness of youth service programs have shown that for every dollar spent on these projects at least $1.20 worth of benefits are produced in terms of work performed and services provided by youth service participants.

It is time that we revive the notion of citizenship. I continue to believe we can rekindle the spirit and activism which has motivated American youth in the past. John F. Kennedy sent out a call and received an answer to the challenge "Ask not what your country can do for you—ask what you can do for your country." I believe that my proposal for voluntary national service can succeed in rekindling this flame of activism and sounding a new call to national service. I sincerely hope that these remarks, and the legislation which follows, will help foster a renewed debate on the immense potential of voluntary service. For the convenience of my colleagues, the text of my legislation follows:

REPORT

PURSUANT TO FEDERAL REGULATION OF LOBBYING ACT

P	QUARTER
	1st	2d	3d	4th

NOTE ON ITEM "A".—(a) IN GENERAL. This "Report" form may be used by either an organization or an individual, as follows:
(i) "Employee".—To file as an "employee", state (in Item "B") the name, address, and nature of business of the "employer". (If the "employee" is a firm [such as a law firm or public relations firm], partners and salaried staff members of such firm may join in filing a Report as an "employee".)
(ii) "Employer".—To file as an "employer", write "None" in answer to Item "B".
(b) SEPARATE REPORTS. An agent or employee should not attempt to combine his Report with the employer's Report:
(i) Employers subject to the Act must file separate Reports and are not relieved of this requirement merely because Reports are filed by their agents or employees.
(ii) Employees subject to the Act must file separate Reports and are not relieved of this requirement merely because Reports are filed by their employers.

A. ORGANIZATION OR INDIVIDUAL FILING:

1. State name, address, and nature of business.

2. If this Report is for an Employer, list names of agents or employees who will file Reports for this Quarter.

NOTE ON ITEM "B".—Reports by Agents or Employees. An employee is to file, each quarter, as many Reports as he has employers, except that: (a) If a particular undertaking is jointly financed by a group of employers, the group is to be considered as one employer, but all members of the group are to be named, and the contribution of each member is to be specified; (b) if the work is done in the interest of one person but payment therefor is made by another, a single Report—naming both persons as "employers"—is to be filed each quarter.

B. EMPLOYER.—State name, address, and nature of business. If there is no employer, write "None."

NOTE ON ITEM "C".—(a) The expression "in connection with legislative interests," as used in this Report, means "in connection with attempting, directly or indirectly, to influence the passage or defeat of legislation." "The term 'legislation' means bills, resolutions, amendments, nominations, and other matters pending or proposed in either House of Congress, and includes any other matter which may be the subject of action by either House"—§302(e).
(b) Before undertaking any activities in connection with legislative interests, organizations and individuals subject to the Lobbying Act are required to file a "Preliminary" Report (Registration).
(c) After beginning such activities, they must file a "Quarterly" Report at the end of each calendar quarter in which they have either received or expended anything of value in connection with legislative interests.

C. LEGISLATIVE INTERESTS, AND PUBLICATIONS in connection therewith:

1. State approximately how long legislative interests are to continue. If receipts and expenditures in connection with legislative interests have terminated, ☐ place an "X" in the box at the left, so that this Office will no longer expect to receive Reports.

2. State the general legislative interests of the person filing and set forth the specific legislative interests by reciting: (a) Short titles of statutes and bills; (b) House and Senate numbers of bills, where known; (c) citations of statutes, where known; (d) whether for or against such statutes and bills.

3. In the case of those publications which the person filing has caused to be issued or distributed in connection with legislative interests, set forth: (a) Description, (b) quantity distributed; (c) date of distribution, (d) name of printer or publisher (if publications were paid for by person filing) or name of donor (if publications were received as a gift).

(Answer items 1, 2, and 3 in the space below. Attach additional pages if more space is needed)

4. If this is a "Preliminary" Report (Registration) rather than a "Quarterly" Report, state below what the nature and amount of anticipated expenses will be; and if for an agent or employee, state also what the daily, monthly, or annual rate of compensation is to be. If this is a "Quarterly" Report, disregard this item "C4" and fill out items "D" and "E" on the back of this page. Do not attempt to combine a "Preliminary" Report (Registration) with a "Quarterly" Report.

REPORT

PURSUANT TO FEDERAL REGULATION OF LOBBYING ACT

P	QUARTER
	1st	2d	3d	4th

NOTE ON ITEM "A".—(a) IN GENERAL. This "Report" form may be used by either an organization or an individual, as follows:
(i) "Employee".—To file as an "employee", state (in Item "B") the name, address, and nature of business of the "employer". (If the "employee" is a firm [such as a law firm or public relations firm], partners and salaried staff members of such firm may join in filing a Report as an "employee".)
(ii) "Employer".—To file as an "employer", write "None" in answer to Item "B".
(b) SEPARATE REPORTS. An agent or employee should not attempt to combine his Report with the employer's Report:
(i) Employers subject to the Act must file separate Reports and are not relieved of this requirement merely because Reports are filed by their agents or employees.
(ii) Employees subject to the Act must file separate Reports and are not relieved of this requirement merely because Reports are filed by their employers.

A. ORGANIZATION OR INDIVIDUAL FILING:
1. State name, address, and nature of business.

2. If this Report is for an Employer, list names of agents or employees who will file Reports for this Quarter.

NOTE ON ITEM "B".—Reports by Agents or Employees. An employee is to file, each quarter, as many Reports as he has employers, except that: (a) If a particular undertaking is jointly financed by a group of employers, the group is to be considered as one employer, but all members of the group are to be named, and the contribution of each member is to be specified; (b) if the work is done in the interest of one person but payment therefor is made by another, a single Report—naming both persons as "employers"—is to be filed each quarter.

B. EMPLOYER.—State name, address, and nature of business. If there is no employer, write "None."

NOTE ON ITEM "C".—(a) The expression "in connection with legislative interests," as used in this Report, means "in connection with attempting, directly or indirectly, to influence the passage or defeat of legislation." "The term 'legislation' means bills, resolutions, amendments, nominations, and other matters pending or proposed in either House of Congress, and includes any other matter which may be the subject of action by either House"—§302(e).
(b) Before undertaking any activities in connection with legislative interests, organizations and individuals subject to the Lobbying Act are required to file a "Preliminary" Report (Registration).
(c) After beginning such activities, they must file a "Quarterly" Report at the end of each calendar quarter in which they have either received or expended anything of value in connection with legislative interests.

C. LEGISLATIVE INTERESTS, AND PUBLICATIONS in connection therewith:

1. State approximately how long legislative interests are to continue. If receipts and expenditures in connection with legislative interests have terminated, place an "X" in the box at the left, so that this Office will no longer expect to receive Reports. ☐

2. State the general legislative interests of the person filing and set forth the specific legislative interests by reciting: (a) Short titles of statutes and bills; (b) House and Senate numbers of bills, where known; (c) citations of statutes, where known; (d) whether for or against such statutes and bills.

3. In the case of those publications which the person filing has caused to be issued or distributed in connection with legislative interests, set forth: (a) Description, (b) quantity distributed; (c) date of distribution, (d) name of printer or publisher (if publications were paid for by person filing) or name of donor (if publications were received as a gift).

(Answer items 1, 2, and 3 in the space below. Attach additional pages if more space is needed)

4. If this is a "Preliminary" Report (Registration) rather than a "Quarterly" Report, state below what the nature and amount of anticipated expenses will be; and if for an agent or employee, state also what the daily, monthly, or annual rate of compensation is to be. If this is a "Quarterly" Report, disregard this item "C4" and fill out items "D" and "E" on the back of this page. Do not attempt to combine a "Preliminary" Report (Registration) with a "Quarterly" Report.

AFFIDAVIT

NOTE ON ITEM "D."—(a) In General. The term "contribution" includes anything of value. When an organization or individual uses printed or duplicated matter in a campaign attempting to influence legislation, money received by such organization or individual—for such printed or duplicated matter—is a "contribution." "The term 'contribution' includes a gift, subscription, loan, advance, or deposit of money, or anything of value, and includes a contract, promise, or agreement, whether or not legally enforceable, to make a contribution"—Section 302(a) of the Lobbying Act.

(b) IF THIS REPORT IS FOR AN EMPLOYER.—(i) In General. Item "D" is designed for the reporting of all receipts from which expenditures are made, or will be made, in accordance with legislative interests.

(ii) Receipts of Business Firms and Individuals.—A business firm (or individual) which is subject to the Lobbying Act by reason of expenditures which it makes in attempting to influence legislation—but which has no funds to expend except those which are available in the ordinary course of operating a business not connected in any way with the influencing of legislation—will have no receipts to report, even though it does have expenditures to report.

(iii) Receipts of Multipurpose Organizations.—Some organizations do not receive any funds which are to be expended solely for the purpose of attempting to influence legislation. Such organizations make such expenditures out of a general fund raised by dues, assessments, or other contributions. The percentage of the general fund which is used for such expenditures indicates the percentage of dues, assessments, or other contributions which may be considered to have been paid for that purpose. Therefore, in reporting receipts, such organizations may specify what that percentage is, and report their dues, assessments, and other contributions on that basis. However, each contributor of $500 or more is to be listed, regardless of whether the contribution was made solely for legislative purposes.

(c) IF THIS REPORT IS FOR AN AGENT OR EMPLOYEE.—(i) In General. In the case of many employees, all receipts will come under Items "D 5" (received for services) and "D 12" (expense money and reimbursements). In the absence of a clear statement to the contrary, it will be presumed that your employer is to reimburse you for all expenditures which you make in connection with legislative interests.

(ii) Employer as Contributor of $500 or More.—When your contribution from your employer (in the form of salary, fee, etc.) amounts to $500 or more, it is not necessary to report such contribution under "D 13" and "D 14," since the amount has already been reported under "D 5," and the name of the "employer" has been given under Item "B" on page 1 of this report.

REPORT

PURSUANT TO FEDERAL REGULATION OF LOBBYING ACT

P	QUARTER
	1st	2d	3d	4th

NOTE ON ITEM "A".—(a) IN GENERAL. This "Report" form may be used by either an organization or an individual, as follows:
(i) "Employee".—To file as an "employee", state (in Item "B") the name, address, and nature of business of the "employer". (If the "employee" is a firm [such as a law firm or public relations firm], partners and salaried staff members of such firm may join in filing a Report as an "employee".)
(ii) "Employer".—To file as an "employer", write "None" in answer to Item "B".
(b) SEPARATE REPORTS. An agent or employee should not attempt to combine his Report with the employer's Report:
(i) Employers subject to the Act must file separate Reports and are not relieved of this requirement merely because Reports are filed by their agents or employees.
(ii) Employees subject to the Act must file separate Reports and are not relieved of this requirement merely because Reports are filed by their employers.

A. ORGANIZATION OR INDIVIDUAL FILING:
1. State name, address, and nature of business.

2. If this Report is for an Employer, list names of agents or employees who will file Reports for this Quarter.

NOTE ON ITEM "B".—Reports by Agents or Employees. An employee is to file, each quarter, as many Reports as he has employers, except that: (a) If a particular undertaking is jointly financed by a group of employers, the group is to be considered as one employer, but all members of the group are to be named, and the contribution of each member is to be specified; (b) if the work is done in the interest of one person but payment therefor is made by another, a single Report—naming both persons as "employers"—is to be filed each quarter.

B. EMPLOYER.—State name, address, and nature of business. If there is no employer, write "None."

NOTE ON ITEM "C".—(a) The expression "in connection with legislative interests," as used in this Report, means "in connection with attempting, directly or indirectly, to influence the passage or defeat of legislation." "The term 'legislation' means bills, resolutions, amendments, nominations, and other matters pending or proposed in either House of Congress, and includes any other matter which may be the subject of action by either House"—§ 302(e).
(b) Before undertaking any activities in connection with legislative interests, organizations and individuals subject to the Lobbying Act are required to file a "Preliminary" Report (Registration).
(c) After beginning such activities, they must file a "Quarterly" Report at the end of each calendar quarter in which they have either received or expended anything of value in connection with legislative interests.

C. LEGISLATIVE INTERESTS, AND PUBLICATIONS in connection therewith:

1. State approximately how long legislative interests are to continue. If receipts and expenditures in connection with legislative interests have terminated, ☐ place an "X" in the box at the left, so that this Office will no longer expect to receive Reports.

2. State the general legislative interests of the person filing and set forth the specific legislative interests by reciting: (a) Short titles of statutes and bills; (b) House and Senate numbers of bills, where known; (c) citations of statutes, where known; (d) whether for or against such statutes and bills.

3. In the case of those publications which the person filing has caused to be issued or distributed in connection with legislative interests, set forth: (a) Description, (b) quantity distributed; (c) date of distribution, (d) name of printer or publisher (if publications were paid for by person filing) or name of donor (if publications were received as a gift).

(Answer items 1, 2, and 3 in the space below. Attach additional pages if more space is needed)

4. If this is a "Preliminary" Report (Registration) rather than a "Quarterly" Report, state below what the nature and amount of anticipated expenses will be; and if for an agent or employee, state also what the daily, monthly, or annual rate of compensation is to be. If this is a "Quarterly" Report, disregard this item "C4" and fill out items "D" and "E" on the back of this page. Do not attempt to combine a "Preliminary" Report (Registration) with a "Quarterly" Report.

NOTE ON ITEM "D."—(a) In General. The term "contribution" includes anything of value. When an organization or individual uses printed or duplicated matter in a campaign attempting to influence legislation, money received by such organization or individual—for such printed or duplicated matter—is a "contribution." "The term 'contribution' includes a gift, subscription, loan, advance, or deposit of money, or anything of value, and includes a contract, promise, or agreement, whether or not legally enforceable, to make a contribution"—Section 302(a) of the Lobbying Act.

(b) IF THIS REPORT IS FOR AN EMPLOYER.—(i) In General. Item "D" is designed for the reporting of all receipts from which expenditures are made, or will be made, in accordance with legislative interests.

(ii) Receipts of Business Firms and Individuals.—A business firm (or individual) which is subject to the Lobbying Act by reason of expenditures which it makes in attempting to influence legislation—but which has no funds to expend except those which are available in the ordinary course of operating a business not connected in any way with the influencing of legislation—will have no receipts to report, even though it does have expenditures to report.

(iii) Receipts of Multipurpose Organizations.—Some organizations do not receive any funds which are to be expended solely for the purpose of attempting to influence legislation. Such organizations make such expenditures out of a general fund raised by dues, assessments, or other contributions. The percentage of the general fund which is used for such expenditures indicates the percentage of dues, assessments, or other contributions which may be considered to have been paid for that purpose. Therefore, in reporting receipts, such organizations may specify what that percentage is, and report their dues, assessments, and other contributions on that basis. However, each contributor of $500 or more is to be listed, regardless of whether the contribution was made solely for legislative purposes.

(c) IF THIS REPORT IS FOR AN AGENT OR EMPLOYEE.—(i) In General. In the case of many employees, all receipts will come under Items "D 5" (received for services) and "D 12" (expense money and reimbursements). In the absence of a clear statement to the contrary, it will be presumed that your employer is to reimburse you for all expenditures which you make in connection with legislative interests.

(ii) Employer as Contributor of $500 or More.—When your contribution from your employer (in the form of salary, fee, etc.) amounts to $500 or more, it is not necessary to report such contribution under "D 13" and "D 14," since the amount has already been reported under "D 5," and the name of the "employer" has been given under Item "B" on page 1 of this report.

SENATE—Thursday, January 31, 1985

(Legislative day of Monday, January 21, 1985)

The Senate met at 10 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND].

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

There is a way that seemeth right unto a man, but the end thereof are the ways of death.—Proverbs 14:12.

Eternal God, in our television indoctrinated culture where crimes are committed and solved in 28 minutes, we have become addicted to the instantaneous solution. We tend to measure our judgments in the interest of immediate results which often may be destructive in the long term. Help us, Eternal Father, to take the long look to see things in perspective. Give us grace to consider the destination of the way we take rather than settle for what we can see to the next curve or hill. We are profoundly grateful, dear God, for the long view of our Founding Fathers who, despite incredible pressures, gave us a way which we still take seriously and to which we seek to conform. Save us, Lord, from pragmatism which would settle for anything less than God's best, that would short circuit truth and justice. In the name of Him who is Truth. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE ACTING MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The distinguished acting majority leader is recognized.

Mr. SIMPSON. Thank you, Mr. President pro tempore.

THE NATIONAL PRAYER BREAKFAST

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, let me thank the Chaplain again for his remarks, which were most moving, and on a particular day when many of us have come from the National Prayer Breakfast which was a very marvelous experience.

The President shared with us his philosophy and his feelings about this day, and it was a very impressive morning of the National Prayer Breakfast.

SERMONS ON THE HILL

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I appreciate the opportunity to have printed in the RECORD an article from this morning's Wall Street Journal about our Chaplain. It is a very excellent article. I commend it to my colleagues and thank the Chair for that opportunity.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that that article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal, Jan. 31, 1985]

SERMONS ON THE HILL BECOME A TRADEMARK OF SENATE'S CHAPLAIN: REV. RICHARD HALVERSON GETS POINTS ACROSS IN PRAYERS; AN AMEN FROM THE PRESS

(By David Shribman)

WASHINGTON.—Let us pray.

"Save us, Lord," the preacher says, "from immaturity that cannot handle the prestige of high office, from love of power which breeds abuse and arrogance in power which corrupts."

The Rev. Richard C. Halverson, a former vaudevillian, speaks of the heavens to try to bring his flock down to earth.

Mr. Halverson is the Senate chaplain and, not so incidentally, one of the shrewdest observers on Capitol Hill. He addresses his prayers to God, but they often seem to be sermons on the Hill, directed at his parishioners.

"Dear God," he said at the opening of the election-year session last January, "surprise even senators by leading them through a productive legislative session."

BALM FOR THE LOSERS

Two months later, when it seemed as if half the senators had limped back to the chamber after decisive losses in the early presidential primaries, Mr. Halverson greeted them with a poignant prayer:

"We pray this morning for the senators who have withdrawn from the race for nomination," he said. "Be real to them in their lonely, questioning hours. Minister to whatever need they experience within. Especially do we pray for their wives, who probably suffer more than their husbands."

And as the vote on the school-prayer issue approached, he prayed: "Help the people to understand, Lord, that no senator is against prayer whatever his or her position on the issue." A few days later, he asked God to protect his Senate flock from "zealous advocates who often are very nasty and abusive."

Mr. Halverson, who was the minister of the Fourth Presbyterian Church in Bethesda, Md., for nearly a quarter-century, has transformed the normally invisible chaplain's post into one of Washington's bully pulpits. His prayers often drew humorous responses from Howard Baker of Tennessee, the former majority leader, who would ask—only partly in jest—for equal time.

"He used to pray for the President, for Congress, and even for the pages and telephone operators," says Mr. Baker, now a Washington lawyer. "But the day he started praying for the tax collectors, I told him he had started meddling."

With his shock of white hair and his domineering presence, Mr. Halverson is one of the few figures in the capital who can go over the head of Congress without fear of political repercussions. "Help the Senate to avoid superfluous issues that retard rather than advance progress," he said last February. As the Senate gathered for a new session recently, he prayed, "May the pressure of special interests and public clamor not have priority over truth and justice."

Mr. Halverson's appeal is bipartisan. "In telling us not to be so pompous around here, he lets us know that not only our constituents are watching what we do," says Sen. John Melcher, the Montana Democrat.

Mr. Halverson, who is the 60th Senate chaplain, isn't the first to find inspiration in the events of the day. Jacob Douche, an Episcopal clergyman who was chaplain to the Continental Congress, read the 35th Psalm when told—wrongly, it turned out—that the British had fired upon Boston: "Let them be turned back and brought to confusion that devise my hurt."

Four days after the Declaration of Independence, Mr. Douche again led the Continental Congress in prayer, this time for the survival of the frail young nation. "Look down in mercy, we beseech Thee, on these our American states, who have fled to Thee from the rod of the oppressor," he intoned.

In the beginning, and unto this day, the notion of congressional chaplains has generated great controversy.

In 1774, John Jay of New York and John Rutledge of South Carolina complained that the presence of Congregationalists, Presbyterians, Anabaptists, Episcopalians and Quakers in the Continental Congress made a single prayer impossible. But Samuel Adams of Massachusetts put an end to the debate when he responded, "I am no bigot. I can hear prayers from a man of piety and virtue, who is at the same time a friend of his country."

Four years before the outbreak of the Civil War, when the country was being torn apart by the slavery question and was most in need of divine intervention, a group of congressmen questioned whether a legislative chaplain "conflicted with the spirit of the Constitution and tended to promote a union of church and state."

In our own time, Mike Royko, the iconoclastic Chicago columnist, wrote, "If you senators and your 6,000 staff members need somebody to hold your hand or pray for you, his $52,000-a-year salary should come out of your own pockets, not ours." (Mr. Halverson's salary, which is set by the Senate, now has risen to $61,887, and his House counterpart, the Rev. James D. Ford, is paid $73,300 a year.)

The Supreme Court in 1983, however, upheld the "deeply imbedded" practice of opening legislative sessions with prayer.

Mr. Halverson, the latest Senate chaplain, grew up among the 50 wheat-farming families of Pingree, N.D., sang for nickels outside a pool hall, toured the West with a Canadian vaudeville troupe called the Winnee-peg Kiddies and sought glamour in the studios of Hollywood. But a dramatic religious awakening pushed him to the pulpit rather than the stage.

"I think of myself as a pastor to all of the Senate and their families, and all of the staffs and their families," he says. "I spend most of my time doing pastoral calls, the way other clergymen do."

Those calls take him to the Senate floor itself. He tries to sense, as he puts it, "where people are hurting and where there's hostility." A theme that runs through his prayers is the notion that senators are people, too.

"I like to remind them," he says, "to be spouses and parents when they go home, not senators."

In a prayer he gave a year ago, he offered a stern warning: "Pressure, tension, urgency build, and it is easy to justify neglecting spouses and children. Help us to realize that there is no adequate substitute for a husband and wife, no adequate substitute for a father and mother."

Sen. Mark Hatfield, who has known Mr. Halverson for three decades, and who orchestrated his appointment, believes that the chaplain, for all his political acumen, is only marginally interested in politics. "He is interested in the people of politics," the Oregon Republican says. "But each one of us has felt that he has captured an insight on the issue of the day, verbalizing it in a prayer."

Mr. Halverson believes his parish also includes the congressional press corps, and he often visits the press gallery. Sometimes his invocations even have journalistic themes.

"Help the press and the media not to be hardened when they suffer the wrath of those who resent it when truth is exposed—or by the hypocrisy, caprice and weakness of the human flesh, remembering that they also are human," he said last year. "Save them from cynicism and help them not to impregnate the public mind with seeds of cynicism."

To which we add, "Amen."

[Mr. STAFFORD assumed the chair.]

THANKS TO SENATOR STAFFORD

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I particularly thank Senator STAFFORD, who now occupies the chair. He is certainly a utility man today, all around, touching all bases. I deeply appreciate your willingness to open the Senate, and I did make it. I thank you for being available and your kindness indeed throughout my Senate tenure because you have been the chairman of my committee. I appreciate your being available.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thanks you.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, with that, we have special orders. We have 10 minutes for the minority leader, and he is represented by Senator PROXMIRE this morning.

We have special orders not to exceed 15 minutes each, and there are a rather lengthy array of those—Senators COCHRAN, PROXMIRE, SPECTER, BENTSEN, BYRD, BAUCUS, BIDEN, BRADLEY, LONG, LEVIN, RIEGLE, HOLLINGS, CHILES, BINGAMAN, and BOREN.

Following the conclusion of the special orders just identified, there will be a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to exceed the hour of 2 p.m., with statements limited therein to 5 minutes each.

Following morning business, it will be the intention of the leadership to turn to any Executive nominations which may be cleared for action and perhaps there may be a rollcall vote if Cabinet-level nominations might be cleared.

I can share with my colleagues the schedule for the remainder of this week and what we can share with you about next week.

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL MONDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1985, AT 10 A.M.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today it stand in recess until 10 a.m. on Monday, February 4, 1985, for a pro forma session only.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SIMPSON. No business will be transacted during Monday's session, Mr. President.

For the information of all Senators, there will be no Friday session of the Senate this week.

ORDER FOR RECESS FROM MONDAY UNTIL TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1985, AT 2 P.M.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business on Monday, the Senate stand in recess until 2 p.m. on Tuesday, February 5.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDERS FOR TUESDAY FEBRUARY 5, 1985

ORDER FOR THE RECOGNITION OF CERTAIN SENATORS

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, after the recognition of the two leaders on Tuesday, I ask unanimous consent that the following Senators be recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes each for special orders: Senators SPECTER and PROXMIRE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR A PERIOD FOR THE TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS ON TUESDAY

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, following the special orders just identified, I ask unanimous consent that there then be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, not to exceed the hour of 3 p.m., with statements limited therein to 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE ON TUESDAY

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, following morning business on Tuesday, it will be the intention of the leadership to turn to any nominations available, possibly the nomination of William Bennett, to be Secretary of Education. Therefore, a rollcall vote at that date is a distinct possibility.

With that, Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of the leader's time and yield to my friend.

RECOGNITION OF THE ACTING MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the acting minority leader is recognized.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the minority leader be reserved until he has an opportunity to use it later in the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, may I just say to the Chair that I have a special order, also the distinguished Senator from Mississippi has a special order, and whatever order the Chair wishes to provide for is fine with me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. COCHRAN] will be recognized first.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Fine.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR COCHRAN

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator seeks recognition, the Senator from Mississippi is recognized.

THE STRATEGIC DEFENSE INITIATIVE

Mr. COCHRAN, Mr. President, on January 29, the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] took a special order and discussed a recent article written by three distinguished defense experts which was published in the New York Times magazine on January 27.

A copy of the New York Times magazine article was made a part of the RECORD by Senator PROXMIRE following his remarks which appear on page S. 737 of the RECORD on January 29.

I read those remarks and I had read the article in the New York Times magazine which was written, incidentally, by Zbigniew Brzezinski, Robert Jastrow, and Max Kampelman, all of whom are described by the Senator from Wisconsin as persons with an impressive combination of experience and scientific competence.

I agree. These are outstanding experts in their fields of science, defense, and diplomacy.

I was impressed with their article, Mr. President, because it set out in a very persuasive way an argument for support of the defense initiative the President advocated in his 1983 address when he first called attention to the proposal he was making for a program of research to see whether or not there could be an alternative to our doctrine of mutual assured destruction, to better safeguard the security and the safety of our United States from the threat of strategic attack from the Soviet Union or other potential enemies.

This article contains a very detailed description of some aspects of the technical research that is going on. It also sets forth some principles that are the underlying foundation for the hope for an alternative to the current doctrine which amounts simply to a threat to retaliate against any potential enemy who might consider launching a nuclear strike against the United States.

As pointed out in the article, our search for security up until this point has been restricted, as a matter of national policy, to designing offensive weapons to deter aggression through a fear of reprisal.

I think it is important to recognize that most Americans probably do not realize, or did not before the President attracted the attention of the country to this serious problem, that we have no defense against an attack from the Soviet Union which would utilize its nuclear arsenal and its intercontinental ballistic missile capabilities. We have absolutely no defense.

One other factor that I think the American people are just now beginning to realize in this entire debate and discussion of the strategic defense initiative is that the proposal that is being made and which is now being funded by the Congress for research is a nonnuclear defense that would permit the United States to rely upon something other than just a threat of reprisal in order to safeguard the security of its citizens and this great country of ours.

Mr. PROXMIRE, in his excellent recitation of the facts, comes to what I think is a conclusion that is not based on the record, and that is that the writers of this article in the New York Times Magazine are talking about a completely different kind of defense from that being advocated by the President of the United States.

I am not conversant with everything the President has said in every instance about the strategic initiative proposal. But what I hope the Senate will look upon as authoritative in this respect is the pamphlet that has been issued by the White House entitled "The President's Strategic Defense Initiative." It was issued on January 3, 1985. Excerpts were published on that day in the New York Times.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, at this time to have printed in the RECORD a copy of these excerpts.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXCERPTS—THE PRESIDENT'S STRATEGIC DEFENSE INITIATIVE

WASHINGTON, January 3—Following are excerpts from a pamphlet issued today by the White House titled "The President's Strategic Defense Initiative":

PRESIDENTIAL FOREWORD

Since the advent of nuclear weapons, every President has sought to minimize the risk of nuclear destruction by maintaining effective forces to deter aggression and by pursuing complementary arms control agreements. This approach has worked. We and our allies have succeeded in preventing nuclear war while protecting Western security for nearly four decades.

Originally, we relied on balanced defensive and offensive forces to deter. But over the last 20 years, the United States has nearly abandoned efforts to develop and deploy defenses against nuclear weapons, relying instead almost exclusively on the threat of nuclear retaliation. We accepted the notion that if both we and the Soviet Union were able to retaliate with devastating power even after absorbing a first strike, that stable deterrence would endure. That rather novel concept seemed at the time to be sensible for two reasons. First, the Soviets stated that they believed that both sides should have roughtly equal forces and neither side should seek to alter the balance to gain unilateral advantage. Second, there did not seem to be any alternative. The state of the art in defensive systems did not permit an effective defensive system.

Today both of these basic assumptions are being called into question. The pace of the Soviet offensive and defensive buildup has upset the balance in the areas of greatest importance during crises. Furthermore, new technologies are now at hand which may make possible a truly effective non-nuclear defense.

For these reasons and because of the awesome destructive potential of nuclear weapons, we must seek another means of deterring war. It is both militarily and morally necessary. Certainly, there should be a better way to strengthen peace and stability, a way to move away from a future that relies so heavily on the prospect of rapid and massive nuclear retaliation and toward greater reliance on defensive systems which threaten no one.

On March 23, 1983, I announced my decision to take an important first step toward this goal by directing the establishment of a comprehensive and intensive research program, the Strategic Defense Initiative, aimed at eventually eliminating the threat posed by nuclear-armed ballistic missiles.

The Strategic Defense Initiative (S.D.I.) is a program of vigorous research focused on advanced defensive technologies with the aim of finding ways to provide a better basis for deterring aggression, strengthening stability, and increasing the security of the United States and our allies. The S.D.I. research program will provide to a future President and a future Congress the technical knowlege required to support a decision on whether to develop and later deploy advanced defensive systems.

At the same time, the United States is committed to the negotiation of equal and verifiable agreements which bring real reductions in the power of the nuclear arsenals of both sides. To this end, my Administration has proposed to the Soviet Union a comprehensive set of arms control proposals. We are working tirelessly for the success of these efforts, but we can and must go further in trying to strengthen the peace.

Our research under the Stategic Defense Initiative complements our arms reduction efforts and helps to pave the way for creating a more stable and secure world. The research that we are undertaking is consistent with all of our treaty obligations, including the 1972 Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty.

In the near term, the SDI research program also responds to the ongoing and extensive Soviet anti-ballistic missile (ABM) effort, which includes actual deployments. It provides a powerful deterrent to any Soviet decision to expand its ballistic missile defense capability beyond that permitted by the ABM Treaty. And, in the long term, we have confidence that S.D.I. will be a crucial means by which both the United States and the Soviet Union can safely agree to very deep reductions, and eventually, even the elimination of ballistic missiles and the nuclear weapons they carry.

Our vital interests and those of our allies are inextricably linked. Their safety and ours are one. They, too, rely upon our nuclear forces to deter attack against them. Therefore, as we pursue the promise offered by the Strategic Defense Initiative, we will continue to work closely with our friends and allies. We will insure that, in the event of a future decision to develop and deploy defensive systems—a decision in which consultation with our allies will play an important part—allied, as well as U.S. security against aggression would be enhanced.

Through the S.D.I. research program, I have called upon the great scienfitic talents of our country to turn to the cause of strengthening world peace by rendering ballistic missiles impotent and obsolete. In short, I propose to channel our technological prowess toward building a more secure and stable world.

THE PRESIDENT'S VISION

In his March 23 address to the nation, the President described his vision of a world free of its overwhelming dependence in nuclear weapons, a world free once and for all of the threat of nuclear war. The Strategic Defense Initiative, by itself, cannot fully realize this vision nor solve all the security challenges we and our allies will face in the future; for this we will need to seek many solutions—political as well as technological. A long road with much hard work lies ahead of us. The President believes we must begin now. The Strategic Defense Initiative takes a crucial first step.

The basic security of the United States and our allies rests upon our collective ability to deter aggression. Our nuclear retaliatory forces help achieve this security and have deterred war for nearly 40 years. The fact is, however, that we have no defense against nuclear ballistic missile attack. And, as the Soviet building program widens the imbalance in key offensive capabilities, introducing systems whose status and characteristics are more difficult to confirm, our vulnerability and that of our allies to blackmail becomes quite high. In the event deterrence failed, a President's only recourse would be to surrender or to retaliate. Nuclear retaliation, whether massive or limited, would result in the loss of millions of lives.

The President believes strongly that we must find a better way to assure credible deterrence. If we apply our great scientific and engineering talent to the problem of defending against ballistic missiles, there is a very real possibility that future Presidents will be able to deter war by means other than threatening devastation to any aggressor—and by a means which threatens no one.

The President's goal, and his challenge to our scientists and engineers, is to identify the technological problems and to find the technical solutions so that we have the option of using the potential of strategic defenses to provide a more effective, more stable means of keeping the United States and our allies secure from aggression and coercion. The Joint Chiefs of Staff, many respected scientists, and other experts believe that, with firm leadership and adequate funding, recent advances in defense technologies would make such defenses achievable.

WHAT IS THE PRESIDENT'S STRATEGIC DEFENSE INITIATIVE

The President announced his Strategic Defense Initiative (SDI) in his March 23, 1983, address to the nation. Its purpose is to identify ways to exploit recent advances in ballistic missile defense technologies that have potential for strengthening deterrence—and thereby increasing our security and that of our allies. The program is designed to answer a number of fundamental scientific and engineering questions that must be addressed before the promise of these new technologies can be fully assessed. The S.D.I. research program will provide to a future President and a future Congress the technical knowledge necessary to support a decision in the early 1990's on whether to develop and deploy such advanced defensive systems.

As a broad research program, the S.D.I. is not based on any single or preconceived notion of what an effective defense system would look like. A number of different concepts, involving a wide range of technologies, are being examined. No single concept or technology has been identified as the best or the most appropriate. A number of non-nuclear technologies hold promise for dealing effectively with ballistic missiles.

We do feel, however, that the technologies that are becoming available today may offer the possibility of providing a layered defense—a defense that uses various technologies to destroy attacking missiles during each phase of their flight.

Some missiles could be destroyed shortly after they launch as they burn their engines and boost their warheads into space. By destroying a missile during this boost phase, we would also destroy all of the nuclear warheads it carries at the same time. In the case of ICBM's, they would probably be destroyed before leaving the territory of the aggressor.

Next, we could destroy those nuclear warheads that survive the boost phase by attacking them during the post-boost phase. During this phase we would target the device that sits on top of the missile and is used to dispense its warheads while it is in the process of releasing its cargo. By destroying this device, the post-boost vehicle, we can destroy all the warheads not yet released.

Those warheads that have been released and survive, travel for tens of minutes in the void of space on their ballistic trajectories towards their targets. While we would now have to locate, identify, and destroy the individual nuclear warheads themselves, this relatively long midcourse phase of flight again offers us time to exploit advanced technologies to do just that.

Finally, those warheads that survive the outer layers of defense, could be attacked during the terminal phase as they approach the end of their ballistic flight.

The concept of a layered defense could be extremely effective because the progressive layers would be able to work together to provide many opportunities to destroy attacking nuclear warheads well before they approach our territory or that of our allies. An opponent facing several separate layers of defenses would find it difficult to redesign his missiles and their nuclear warheads to penetrate all of the layers. Moreover, defenses during the boost, post-boost and midcourse phases of ballistic missile flight make no distinction in the targets of the attacking missiles—they simply destroy attacking nuclear warheads, and in the process protect people and our country. The combined effectiveness of the defense provided by the multiple layers need not provide 100 percent protection in order to enhance deterrence significantly. It need only create sufficient uncertainty in the mind of a potential aggressor concerning his ability to succeed in the purposes of his attack. The concept of a layered defense certainly will help do this.

There have been considerable advances in technology since U.S. ballistic missile defense were first developed in the 1960's. At the time the ABM Treaty was signed (1972), ballistic missile defense prospects were largely confined to the attacking nuclear warheads during the terminal phase of their flight using nuclear-tipped interceptor missiles. Since that time, emerging technologies offer the possibility of non-nuclear options for destroying missiles and the nuclear warheads they carry in all phases of their flight. New technologies may be able to permit a layered defense by providing: sensors for identifying and tracking missiles and nuclear warheads; advanced ground and spaceborne interceptors and directed energy weapons to destroy both missiles and nuclear warheads; and, the technology to permit the command, control and communications necessary to operate a layered defense.

Effective defenses against ballistic missiles have potential for enhancing deterrence in the future in a number of ways. First, they could significantly increase an aggressor's uncertainties regarding whether his weapons would penetrate the defenses and destroy our missiles and other military targets. It would be very difficult for a potential aggressor to predict his own vulnerability in the face of such uncertainties. An aggressor will be much less likely to contemplate initiating a nuclear conflict, even in crisis circumstances, while lacking confidence in his ability to succeed.

Such uncertainties also would serve to reduce or eliminate the incentive for first strike attack. Modern, accurate ICBM's carrying multiple nuclear warheads—if deployed in sufficiently large numbers relative to the size of an opponent's force structure, as the Soviets have done with their ICBM force—could be used in a rapid first strike to undercut an opponent's ability to retaliate effectively. By significantly reducing or eliminating the ability of ballistic missiles to attach military forces effectively, and thereby rendering them impotent and obsolete as a means of supporting aggression, advanced defenses could remove this potential major source of instability.

Finally, in conjunction with air defenses, very effective defenses against ballistic missiles could help reduce or eliminate the apparent military value of nuclear attack to an aggressor. By preventing an aggressor from destroying a significant portion of our country, an aggressor would have gained nothing by attacking in the first place. In this way, very effective defenses could reduce substantially the possibility of nuclear conflict.

Mr. COCHRAN. In this New York Times article containing the excerpts, I think it is important to notice the goal that is identified that we hope to reach through the research that is underway. It says:

The President's goal, and his challenge to our scientists and engineers, is to identify the technological problems and to find the technical solutions so that we have the option of using the potential of strategic defenses to provide a more effective, more stable means of keeping the United States and our allies secure from aggression and coercion.

Mr. President, I think it is important to note this because some who are debating the issue are now trying to focus attention on the fact that some experts are saying that we need an on-point kind capability to intercept missiles; that this is what our goal is; that the President and the Secretary of Defense are talking about a layered system of defenses. There are arguments being advanced now about the cost of such a program: whether or not it is a $60 billion program or a $126 billion program; whether or not the program is really designed to protect our cities or great population centers; does it extend to a protection of the citizens of Europe or does it not; is it designed to protect just our deterrant, our own missile forces, our own capability to retaliate?

These are, of course, subjects that do need discussion and debate, but I am suggesting, Mr. President, that these advanced concerns are advanced. It is premature now to start arguing about whether or not we are going to deploy this kind of system or whether another kind of system is feasible economically or technically.

At this point, Mr. President, what is important is to commit ourselves as a government to searching for an alternative to the present madness—the madness of mutual assured destruction, which is a way of saying that if an enemy of ours decides to destroy U.S. cities, then we will destroy the cities of that country that sends its missiles across our soil. And that is all there is that we have to offer at the present time. It is no defense, it is frightening, and citizens are terrified at the prospect of a nuclear exchange, which is what we are promising them as their national security if we are attacked. And that is what we are promising any potential enemy.

I am glad the President has led us to this point where we have agreed to provide funding for research. This year it is $1.4 billion. Our Subcommittee on Defense Appropriations approved $1.6 billion for this fiscal year. I was convinced that would be a good investment, and I still am. In the budget that will be sent up next week I am sure we will be asked by the President to provide some additional funding. I do not know how much it will be. I am guessing something in the area of $3 billion. I do not know what the Congress will approve. I hope we approve an amount that will be adequate to keep this program of research under way so that we can find the answers to the questions that are being advanced now in the form of arguments against the effort.

That is my point of criticism, Mr. President. It is not that Senators such as the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin and others are questioning whether or not it is going to be feasible later on to deploy one kind of system or another, but that is the argument now for either abandoning or reducing the effort that is being made or in some way trying to sidetrack the very real and important work that is under way now to seek a safer means of defense and safer way to protect the security of American citizens.

Last October, I was invited to write an editorial on this subject by one of the newspapers in my State. I did on October 2, 1984. I provided the Meridian Star, in Meridian, MS, with my thoughts on this subject.

At this point, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to include in my remarks a copy of that article.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STRATEGIC DEFENSE

(Thad Cochran, U.S. Senate)

The Senate Committee on Appropriations recently approved spending $286.6 billion for national defense during the fiscal year that began October 1. This is the largest amount for defense ever approved by our Committee.

It is, however, some $18 billion less than the President requested.

I don't know anyone who really feels comfortable discussing the immense cost of national security. It is a budget item that even the most zealous warriors would like to see at a lower level and still be responsive to the threat and the challenge posed by the recent actions of the Soviet Union.

The facts are disquieting. We have no defense against the nuclear arsenal that has been assembled and deployed by the Soviets.

More than twenty years ago it was decided by our national leaders that the most effective defense for us was an arsenal of our own that would give us the capability of destroying any nation that might attack us.

This nuclear doctrine came to be known as Mutually Assured Destruction. Any nation that sought to destroy or inflict damage on us could be assured that the same damage or destruction would be meted out in return.

An essential element in this doctrine is the ability to survive a first strike by an enemy and then be able to retaliate.

Many in Congress are arguing against modernizing our nuclear arsenal to guarantee its survivability. For most, the reason stated in their argument is the exhorbitant expense.

The MX missile deployment proposed by the President contemplates 100 new missiles, but Congress is reducing that to 21 and stretching out the deployment period, making the whole program suspect. It may never get done.

Compare that with the deployment by the Soviets of its new missile forces. These include an ICBM force of 818 large modern missiles which carry over six thousand warheads, and almost 400 SS-20s, their intermediate range missiles. The latter can be converted to long range missiles very easily.

The ICBM force is protected, with half of their silos having been rebuilt and hardened, while none of ours has been.

Despair could be our understandable response to this information. But it is not the best response.

My hope is that we will reexamine the concept of no defense. There has to be a more logical and less expensive strategy for our future on earth than the threat to slaughter any enemy who decides to slaughter us.

I admit the strategy has worked so far. We have not been attacked. But, in the past our arsenal has been the best available. The expense didn't seem to matter so much. Now we see forces at work in the country and in our government that make it doubtful to me that we can sustain the effort to keep up in the modern nuclear arms race.

The alternative may be strategic defense. In the bill we have just approved in my committee on defense appropriations over $1.6 billion is allocated for research that will enable us to determine whether it is scientifically possible to develop a defense against the nuclear weapons of the Soviet Union.

There are some leading scientists and defense experts who are confident this can be done. If they are right, and I hope they are, we could then press the Soviets to renegotiate the Anti Ballistic Missile treaty of the 1960s and move into a much safer and less expensive relationship than we have seen develop over these past twenty years of escalating nuclear power.

Modern technology offers the hope that security and arms control don't have to depend solely on a written agreement with an enemy who can't be trusted. It may hold the key to unlocking the door to a better and brighter future for all mankind.

The President urged the Congress to embark on this important effort, and when he did he asked us, "Would it not be better to save lives than to avenge them?" I think it would.

Mr. COCHRAN. My conclusion at that time, Mr. President, and it remains the same today, was that there is compelling evidence to show that modern technology, today's technology, offers the hope that security and arms control do not have to depend solely on a threat to annihilate a potential enemy, or a written agreement with an enemy who cannot be trusted. But technology offers the hope that we can unlock the door to a brighter and better future, safer for not only the citizens of the United States but for all mankind. When he asked the Congress to embark on this research project and support it, the President said, "Would it not be better to save lives than to avenge them?"

I think it would be.

Everybody wants to stop the arms race. I want it to stop. Some are saying, "Well, let us just stop it now."

Well, that is fine, but we are not the only people in the race. We cannot just say to the Soviet Union, "Let us stop running along this track," and expect that they will stop. Our experience in dealing with the Soviet Union over time has shown us that things just do not work that way in real life. While "nuclear freeze" sounds appealing, and "stop the arms race cold and stop it now" sounds appealing, we better be careful that we do not substitute a slogan for true security.

That is my point, Mr. President. We need to conduct this research and do it in an aggressive way, making available the funds that we can now to see if there is not a better alternative.

Just yesterday in the Wall Street Journal there was an excellent article by Mr. Vermont Royster on this subject.

I think it is a nice conclusion to my remarks today on this subject, Mr. President, and I ask unanimous consent that his article be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THINKING THINGS OVER

(By Vermont Royster)

"STAR WARS" OR MADNESS?

One lesson from mankind's long history of wars is that there is no such thing as a perfect defense against a determined foe. From shields to castles and moats to the Maginot line, all have failed before the ingenuity of man at the making and use of weapons.

So a certain amount of skepticism is in order about the new defense shield against space missiles that President Reagan talks of developing. Dubbed "Star Wars" by some unknown journalist (probably a headline writer), it contemplates advancing technology to the point where incoming missiles, atomic or otherwise, can be shot down before they reach the U.S.

There are a lot of "ifs" in this program in its present state. For one, the technology is not yet developed. There must be not only the capability of using lasers to shoot them down but also the ability to instantly detect the hostile missiles and then properly aim and fire the intercepting weapons.

Then there is the cost, at present beyond measuring, of developing the system. Estimates run to many billions. And nobody knows how long it would take.

These are valid reasons for skepticism, for thinking Mr. Reagan's idea is a sort of pie in the sky. There are even reasons for moving carefully before trying to launch such a program.

But there are other objections raised, both here and in the Soviet Union, which are, to say the least, puzzling. Some here object that the system won't assure us perfect protection against Soviet atomic missiles, which is doubtless true, and argue that therefore it's not worth trying.

A peculiar objection, surely. A bronze shield against hostile spears was certainly better than nothing. Castles and moats did save the inhabitants on many occasions; at the very least they forced attackers to strain their resources. A less than perfect defense is better than none.

The objections from the Soviets are hardly surprising; they object to everything. Possibly misled by that phrase "Star Wars" with its impression of weapons rained down from space, they want the as-yet-unattained system included in the arms talks. Complained one Soviet official after Geneva: "Whenever our side tried to learn the specifics of the American space-arms program, Mr. Shultz tried to answer with vague generalities and unhelpful lectures."

I don't know about the unhelpful lectures but the "vague generalities" were necessary. Neither Mr. Shultz nor anyone else knows anything else at this point.

Nonetheless, the real worry in the Soviet mind isn't hard to figure out. If it were possible to build an effective defense against Soviet missiles (note the use of that subjunctive "were"), that would certainly pose problems for the Soviet military. In that case they couldn't launch a missile attack with much hope of success. Or, in the parlance of the gridiron, a good defense is a strong offense. You can't win if you can't score.

Consequently, if the U.S. were to develop a good defensive system it would also, in that sense, be a handicap for the Soviet Union. Under that reasoning it's wrong for the U.S. to try to develop defensive weapons. That strikes me as about on a par with saying that bullet-proof shields for bank clerks threaten bank robbers.

You can understand, then, why you can expect Mr. Gromyko to keep demanding that this "Star Wars" system either be shared with the Soviet Union or included in any arms-limitation treaty. If the Soviets can't have it we shouldn't either. Gives an unfair advantage.

There's another objection I've heard to beginning the technological exploration of this missile defense, this time not from the Soviet side but from our own.

This objection begins by accepting the idea that there's no such thing as a complete and perfect defense. What's called "Star Wars" is not some new single magic weapon or even a technological innovation on an existing one. Rather, it's a system, the putting together of lasers, computers and other technology to work in combination to locate and shoot down incoming missiles. Lots of room for lots of glitches.

To some, that makes Mr. Reagan's idea an impossible dream of protecting the entire U.S. from incoming missiles, should such ever arrive. The best we could hope for would be a system limited to protecting military installations, and even those not completely. The rest of the country would be left unprotected. To those of that mind that would be intolerable.

The argument here, you see, is that if everything can't be protected nothing should be. Hence the whole project should be abandoned.

I find this the most puzzling of all objections. It's about like objecting to sandbags before a defensive redoubt because some enemy shells penetrate them. Or as if in World War II, British fighter planes should have stayed on the ground because some German bombers got through anyway and wreaked havoc below.

I will admit to some skepticism myself that we can develop a security shield to destroy missiles before they reach their targets here. The technology for it lies far in the future, if ever. Even Mr. Reagan holds it as a "hope," not a promise.

I am mindful, though, that it may be a last best hope. For without it we are left only with the present defense strategy of Mutual Assured Destruction, that if tens of millions of our people are destroyed in an atomic war, our only recourse, as Mr. Reagan restated it the other day, is to threaten tens of millions of our enemies.

So for all the difficulties in realizing the dream, I, for one, will choose the hope of "Star Wars" to the MADness of the present.

Mr. COCHRAN. I yield back the remainder of my time.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I am glad I was on the floor when my good friend from Mississippi made his presentation. He states the case very well, about the best I have heard it stated. Needless to say, I disagree wholeheartedly with his conclusion but I have great admiration for his eloquence and logic.

As I say, it is a very powerful case for a very weak position.

POINT DEFENSE: A DECEPTIVE ROAD TO STAR WARS

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, many of us in the Congress as well as many outside have strongly criticized the strategic defense initiative or Star Wars, the Reagan administration's antiballistic missile program. The potential trillion dollar cost of the program, the fact that it shoves the arms race into a new dimension in space, and the clear violation of the Senate ratified ABM Treaty that the program would require have probably created a congressional majority in opposition to this program. Perhaps not, but I think it probably has. But the administration has a strategy available for overcoming this opposition. The administration has indicated that for the next year or two the Star Wars Program will only require $2 or $3 billion a year for research and development. Over the next 5 years the total cost of R&D is expected to approach $25 billion. The really big trillion dollar production and deployment cost lies ahead in the 1990's and later.

Of course, anybody who thinks we will have solved the deficit problem by the 1990's is very, very optimistic and if we come on with Star Wars, a trillion-dollar program at that point, there is no way it will solve it.

The administration implies that the Congress can jump off that bridge when it comes to it, if it seems wise at the time. To justify the short-term relatively low-level spending, the administration argues that while Star Wars may or may not be an eventual beneficiary, the R&D now being conducted will help us combat an aggressive Soviet antisatellite program with our own antisatellite system. Of course, as the Congress appropriates that $25 billion, it builds a steadily increasing vested interest lobbying dependency that will provide a major push for full Star Wars funding.

In the November issue of Arms Control Today, Jonathan Stein, an expert in strategic studies and the author of a recent book entitled "From H Bomb to Star Wars," describes a second clever strategy we can expect the administration to pursue to eventually secure the Star Wars funding that today probably could not command the congressional majority it will need. Stein contends that the administration may be paving the way for Star Wars by working for a much more limited, less costly, and superficially more realistic goal: the protection of ICBM sites and control centers. Indeed, the Defense Department has contended in its publication: "Defense Against Ballistic Missiles" that their new technology:

> Can provide a basis for choosing specific, partial missile defense systems to be deployed by the early 1990's. Such partial systems could defend perhaps a few critical targets especially against smaller attacks.

As a matter of fact, that fine article that I put into the RECORD by Brzezinski, Jastrow, and Kampelman takes that position.

The DOD goes on to argue,

> Even in a much larger attack the limited effectiveness of a partial system could make a significant contribution to deterrence by depriving the enemy planner of reliable military results of his attack.

Stein argues that this seductive reasoning can lead the country down the path to the trillion dollar Star Wars deployment. And even if it does not, it will involve us in a repudiation of the ABM Treaty that the Senate ratified by an 88-to-2 vote in 1972. Furthermore, the point defense is no more realistic than Star Wars. First, it will discourage arms control and lead to an intense and unstable arms race. Second, it will not work. For example, Stein points out that:

> The most logical and likely Soviet response would be to expand their nuclear forces and restructure them to implement a strategy of defense suppression. The Soviets could deliver precursor waves off reentry vehicles to eliminate most of the point system through saturation. This would be followed by a much heavier ICBM and SLBM assault.

Stein argues that the Soviets could also respond with maneuverable reentry vehicles that can change their flight paths and frustrate even adaptive preferential point defense. With a maneuverable reentry vehicle the defense cannot calculate the impact point in time to intercept it. Furthermore, cruise missiles, bombers, and submarines could penetrate the point defense system just as readily as they could penetrate a comprehensive Star Wars system.

And everybody, Mr. President, agrees that there is no defense Star Wars would have against a cruise missile which hugs the ground and, of course, has no trajectory to shoot at.

Stein deals point defense the real coup de grace when he points out that even if the technology of the system should work, the Soviets not the United States would be the eventual big winners. Obviously, we could not keep such a technology exclusively ours for very long.

The whole history of the arms race has been that our initial technological achievements have, within a brief period of months or a few years, been copied by the Soviets. When both sides have a point defense, who would have the advantage? The answer is loud and clear. Since the Soviets have 75 percent of their deterrent in fixed land based missiles and we have only 25 percent of ours in that presently vulnerable mode, and since the point defense would primarily protect specific, fixed missile launching sites, the big winner in this kind of an arms race would be the Soviet Union by an emphatic 3-to-1 score.

Stein concludes his analysis of the point defense system with this dire warning:

Each superpower would worry that the other's point defense could be quickly upgraded to area defense. In a crisis between the United States and the Soviet Union, the pressure to strike first might increase. Each nation might fear that his opponent was planning to breakout to area defense, launch a first strike, then rely on its upgraded defense to deal with a weakened response. With both sides having such a fear, the danger of nuclear war through accident or loss of control would grow.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article to which I have referred by Jonathan B. Stein from Arms Control Today be printed at this point in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

POINT DEFENSE

Since the launching of the Administration's Strategic Defense Initiative in 1983, the press and public have tended to focus on only one aspect of SDI—space-based defense, or "star wars." During the last debate of the last presidential campaign, for example, the candidates disagreed strongly over star wars without mentioning any other aspect of strategic defense. Much of the media coverage of SDI before the debate also equated the Administration's strategic defense program with space-based defenses.

The focus on star wars is understandable. President Reagan launched SDI in a speech calling for defensive weapons to "save lives rather than avenge them." His Secretary of Defense and other prominent national security officials have often given the impression that SDI and star wars were identical. In response, most of the criticism of SDI, to date, has focused on its space-based components.

Though understandable, the concentration on star wars alone could be dangerous. A very worrisome part of SDI—point defense—is not receiving the attention it should. As a result, point defense has gained some acceptance as the "realistic alternative" to star wars.

While the Reagan Administration has not been trumpeting hard site, local point defense the way it has star wars, it is clear that point defense is very much on the SDI agenda. In fact, the Administration appears to be following a two-part strategy. In public statements, especially by high-level officials, the Administration emphasizes that SDI holds out the prospect of a "thoroughly reliable and total" national defense through star wars. At the working level, however, the Administration's immediate goal is to protect ICBM sites and launch control centers. A key Defense Department (DOD) publication, Defense against Ballistic Missiles: An Assessment of Technology and Policy Implications, notes that the new SDI-developed technology "can provide a basis for choosing specific, partial missile defense systems to be deployed by the early 1990s. Such partial systems could defend perhaps a few critical targets, especially against smaller attacks." Even in a much larger attack, ". . . the limited effectiveness of a partial system could make a significant contribution to deterrence by depriving the enemy planner of reliable military results of his attack."

At first glance, point defense does seem much more "realistic" than star wars. Point defense has a much more limited goal. It aims to protect ICBM sites and associated command-and-control centers by using high-speed missiles to intercept incoming warheads within the atmosphere (endoatmospheric defense) or just outside it (exoatmospheric). Point defense supporters argue that it is technically feasible and attainable in the near term, unlike star wars. (Critics disagree, noting that point defense must be able to discriminate between re-entry vehicles [RVs] and decoys, then destroy the RVs within a hundred seconds. They argue that such a task may not prove technically feasible, or would be subject to easy countermeasures.) Supporters claim point defense will strengthen stability by protecting our land-based missiles, thereby "complicating" a Soviet first strike and making it less likely. It is also said that point defense can use "adaptive preferential tactics" to raise the relative cost of a Soviet attack. Even if the U.S. defends only one or two silos in each missile field, the Soviets—not knowing which missiles are defended—will have to add extra warheads and attack all the missiles. Finally, point defense supporters argue that such defenses will encourage arms control by discouraging first-strike or counterforce arsenals.

POINT DEFENSE AND ARMS RACES

These arguments do not stand up to close analysis. First, point defense would increase the incentives for an arms race and make arms control far less likely. If point defense does prove technologically feasible, the most logical and likely Soviet response would be to expand their nuclear forces and restructure them to implement a strategy of defense suppression. The Soviets could deliver precursor waves of RVs (perhaps) low-entry angle SLBMs that are hard to detect on radars) to eliminate most of the point defense system through saturation. This would be followed by a much heavier ICBM and SLBM assault.

The Soviets could also respond to point defense by developing MaRVs, maneuverable re-entry vehicles. Unlike current RVs, MaRVs can change their flight paths after re-entering the atmosphere. MaRV deployments en masse, coupled with unconstrained Soviet RV increases, will frustrate even adaptive preferential point defense. Because a MaRV can maneuver, the defense will simply not be able to calculate the RV's impact point in time to intercept it.

The Soviets could also expand their other strategic programs to defeat point defense. Stepped-up air and sea-launched cruise missile programs, enhanced bomber penetrability, depressed-trajectory submarine-launched ballistic missiles, and penetration aids could be used to overcome a point defense system. The advent of stealth technologies could turn some of these weapons into offensive prompt hard-target kill platforms, removing the supposed benefits of encouraging the Soviets to shift to slower air-breathing forces. The Soviet military would not necessarily forego developing these systems in the absence of strategic defense, but point defense would certainly be a strong incentive for expansion and a disincentive to cutbacks or arms control.

The Soviets could also heed the suggestion of General Abrahamson, the head of the SDI program, to salvage-fuse their RVs so their nuclear devices explode upon impact with a defensive interceptor. This would probably render defensive radars useless (conventional radars would experience "blackout" and air or space-based infrared sensors would suffer from 'redout.') The Soviets could proliferate penetration aids and decoys, attack command-and-control centers, and destroy space-based assets used for point defense.

In addition to weakening future arms control prospects by encouraging an expanded arms race, point defense would lead to the dismantling of the arms agreements already in place. A point defense will violate the ABM Treaty of 1972 and the Protocol of 1974 because it will be necessary to deploy advanced phased-array radars and interceptors at more than one site and in numbers beyond those allowed (100 fixed, unMIRVed interceptors and 18 radars). The radars and interceptors would probably also have to be mobile, another violation of the Treaty. Amending the Treaty to fit the contours of point defense paves the way to a gradual dismantling of the SALT ABM regime. In the process, a defensive arms race will have been spawned that nurtures the offensive arms race.

Second, it is not clear that the relative costs of an offense-defense arms race will favor the defense.[1] The technology of RVs is "mature," i.e. the research and development has been done, so it is now relatively cheap to deploy new RVs. New MX or SS-18 warheads could be added for about 5 to 8 million dollars per warhead. Defensive technology is at a very early stage. Huge expenditures will be necessary before a defensive system could be in place. (The Administration has requested $26 billion for SDI R&D through 1989.) Deployment of a limited point defense would, of course, be cheaper than deployment of a full, multi-layered defense including star wars. But it should be kept in mind that the deployment of point defenses will increase the pressure for star wars. Strategic defense enthusiasts will be able to argue that point defense would be more successful if Soviet missiles were thinned out in the boost phase and in midcourse. It should also be noted that even if point defense proved affordable, a U.S.-Soviet defense race would not necessarily favor the United States. ICBM point defense would allow the Soviets to protect 75% of their strategic assets. Point defense could be applied to only 25% of our own.

[1] On the problem of Costs, it is instructive to note the rhetorical confusion given free rein within the Administration. On the one hand, the SDIO claims that "the costs of actual development of various possible systems will . . . depend on the characteristics of the systems" (DOD, op. cit., note 1, p. 2), while presidential science adviser George Keyworth knowingly asserts that the SDI's full costs "would be comparable to offensive countermeasures or attempts to rebuild the Soviet ICBM fleet" ("Statement on the SDI," testimony to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, April 25, 1984, p. 7).

Finally, point defense could weaken crisis stability. Because of the number and location of ballistic missile fields (especially in the Soviet Union where many are close to cities) any significant point defense would greatly exacerbate fears of breakout. Each superpower would worry that the other's point defense could be quickly upgraded to area defense. In a crisis between the U.S. and the Soviet Union, the pressure to strike first might increase. Each nation might fear that its opponent was planning to breakout to area defense, launch a first strike, then rely on its upgraded defense to deal with a weakened response. With both sides having such to fear, the danger of nuclear was through accident or loss of control would grow.

Star wars deserves all the criticism it has received. It would be a dangerous mistake, however, to think that point defense offers any better hope for strategic stability, arms control, or enhanced security.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, with point defense, the so-called MAD doctrine that the President has attacked and that the distinguished Senator from Mississippi also criticized this morning, Mutual Assured Destruction, would still be the basic military strategy of our country. We not only would have no defense for our cities, but the only purpose of the SDI, as Brzenski, Jastrow, and Kampelman see it, is to preserve our mutual assured deterrence. We would still have it. They just say this would make it together.

Mr. President, the difficulty with this whole defense operation—it is a happy concept. After all, who would not like to see this kind of defense succeed in stopping an attack on our country or knocking out missiles that would kill Americans?

The difficulty is that we can undoubtedly expect in the next 10 or 20 years that the technology will be able to solve this problem as far as the present offensive missiles are concerned. But the offensive missile system is dynamic. It would develop exactly the way that defense develops. It would be able to stay ahead because the offense can always pick the time, the place, the volume of attack.

Mr. President, I do think that even though this sounds attractive, because they say, all we want is research—I suppose you can make any kind of appeal. H. G. Wells, years ago, in his War of the Worlds, I remember, had a beautiful notion, that one side—our side, the peaceful side, the right side—in a war with tyranny—the Soviet Union—would develop a system of putting all the Soviet people to sleep—a happy, blissful, healthful sleep. They would not die; they would merely sleep. It would end the terrible threat of tyranny.

Why not come up with an idea like that? That is even more beautiful than Star Wars, but it is no more realistic.

[Mr. RUDMAN assumed the chair.]

WHAT'S WRONG WITH FEDERAL JOB APPOINTMENTS: McSTEEN AT SOCIAL SECURITY

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, this Senator has complained about the Reagan administration's consistent policy of ignoring competence in making appointments to top office in the Federal Government. To be fair, this policy is not peculiar to the Reagan administration. Past administrations, Democratic as well as Republican, have shown similar if not as conspicuous a disregard for qualifications in appointing the people that occupy the top management positions in our Government. President Carter's appointment of a wholly unqualified Bert Lance to be the Director of the Office of Management and Budget was not an isolated example. Unfortunately, it was typical.

All right, it is easy to criticize. But what would I do? I think people might say: "Well, PROXMIRE, if you think these appointments are so bad, whom would you appoint?"

The answer is that the country is full of highly qualified people who can do the job, and often the person who can do the job with the fullest qualifications is right there at hand. Take Martha McSteen. Martha McSteen, the Acting Commissioner of Social Security, is a prime example. Martha McSteen has exactly the qualifications we need in a Social Security Commissioner. She has spent a lifetime in the Social Security agency, 38 years to be exact. She has been consistently promoted. She has handled every job within the agency that has been entrusted to her with distinction, winning awards for her competence, right and left, along the way. She has faithfully followed the policies of whatever Presidential administration has been in office, including the Reagan administration.

So what happened to her? Was she continued in her position as Acting Commissioner of Social Security? No; she was replaced by one Dorcas Hardy, who just happened to be closer to the administration—as a Californian and as a consistent right wing Republican.

Mr. President, I am not arguing that McSteen deserved the office more than Hardy just because she had been in office so long. I am arguing that McSteen is obviously the best qualified person to handle the office. Indeed, she had been handling it with distinction for more than a year, and she knows this agency better on the basis of a demonstrated track record of recognized efficiency than anyone else.

Mr. President, for every Ed Meese appointed to a job for which he has no remote qualifications like Attorney General, for every Herrington appointed to a job about which he knows absolutely nothing—in this case as Secretary of Energy—there are hundreds, indeed thousands of persons like Martha McSteen who are better qualified and there are 10 or 15 who are eminently qualified and who are locked out.

This Senator is not crying about the injustice to the Martha McSteens of this world, although she deserves more than our tears. This Senator is concerned about what happens to this Federal Government with this kind of cavalier disregard of competence in losing the likes of Martha McSteen in the management positions that really count in this Government.

What an irony. Here we have the Reagan administration, whose strongest supporters constantly bemoan the stupidity, the lack of forceful intelligence in Federal Government policy. The Reagan supporters never tire of holding up corporate America as the great success story. This Senator happens to think they are right in doing so. Our private sector is far more competently managed than this mammoth, lumbering dinosaur of a stumblebum Federal Government. But why? One big part of the answer is that competition in the private marketplace has forced private business to pick their top managers based on hard, tough, tested, successful experience.

Would a business firm let a Martha McSteen, with 38 great years of one success after another with the organization, get bumped from her job, because someone else happened to come from the right part of town or made the right political noises? Once in a while, yes, that might happen, and it does. But not often. Oh, sure corporate America makes its share of mistakes too. Nepotism and favoritism corrupt some firms. But competition and the constant reminder in results in the marketplace that there is no substitute for competence keeps the private sector mostly on the right track. Experience, a demonstrated winning record of the kind Martha McSteen has earned will usually, if not always, make it in American business. But in the Federal Government? No way. In the most business-minded administration since Coolidge, you can forget competence and experience. Forget it and watch the administration, as in the McSteen case, squander it. That is why this Senator is opposing so many of the nominees of this administration for top office, and why the outlook for the country as well as the administration in the next 4 years is in serious jeopardy.

THE MEESE NOMINATION

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, for some reason, the word got out that I intend to put a hold on the Meese nomination. Not that it would delay it for very long, because I am sure the majority leader is not going to be as hospitable to holding requests by Senators as other majority leaders have been, and I think he would be right if he were not. I am not putting a hold on Ed Meese's nomination. I shall speak against him, I shall vote against him. I think it is a bad nomination, but I certainly will not delay it for 5 minutes, except to speak for half an hour—I should say I shall not delay it more than a half hour. I do not want a time agreement until I can be guaranteed I shall have a half hour to speak on the nomination. But I certainly do not intend to hold it up any more than that.

ED MEESE AND GENERAL DYNAMICS

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, on January 18, 1985, I wrote to Edwin Meese III, Counselor to the President and the President's nominee for Attorney General. I asked Mr. Meese to provide me with information about any meetings or conversations he has had at the White House with officials of the General Dynamics Corp., or with the Navy and the Justice Department concerning the General Dynamics Corp.

This request was made because it recently came to my attention that Mr. Meese had met with David Lewis, chairman of the board of General Dynamics, at the White House on at least one occasion in 1981 to discuss the company's problems with the Navy. At the time, General Dynamics was involved in a dispute with the Navy over its submarine contracts, and the Department of Justice was investigating allegations of fraudulent claims submitted by General Dynamics against the Navy. In additon, General Dynamics was reportedly angered by Adm. H. G. Rickover, who had severely criticized the company's shipbuilding practices, and was attempting to get him fired.

My requests to Mr. Meese were intended to elicit information about the meetings that have a bearing on any of these matters. It so happens that, in the period from August 1981 to December 1981, everything that General Dynamics would have wanted to occur did occur.

The dispute with the Navy was resolved and negotiations began for the noncompetitive award of a new nuclear attack submarine and a new Trident submarine. Admiral Rickover was fired. The Justice Department investigation was closed, and no action was taken.

I received a response to my letter from Mr. Meese on January 29, 1985. Mr. Meese states that neither he nor his staff ever had any contact with the Department of Justice regarding General Dynamics, other than recent, routine briefings for the current confirmation hearings. However, he did have meetings and discussions with the company.

MEETING WITH DAVID LEWIS

The letter confirms that there was a meeting between Mr. Meese and David Lewis and others on August 7, 1981. This meeting concerned a conflict regarding problems in constructing the Trident submarine between the Secretary of Defense and General Dynamics. According to the letter, Mr. Meese "decided the White House would not become involved in the circumstances of the dispute, but that he would call Secretary Weinberger to determine the possibility of arranging a meeting between the parties." No mention is made of whether Mr. Meese actually talked with Secretary Weinberger.

The letter mentions meetings on October 14, 1981, and December 22, 1981, between Mr. Meese's staff and Edward LeFevre, General Dynamics' chief lobbyist in Washington.

The letter also mentions a telephone conversation on August 26, 1981, between Mr. Meese's staff and Mr. LeFevre. According to the letter, "the purpose appears to be a followup to the 7 August 1981 meeting."

The letter mentions a number of other meetings and telephone conversations between Mr. Meese or his staff and officials of General Dynamics.

MEESE RESPONSE RAISES NEW QUESTIONS

I appreciate the fact that Mr. Meese has answered my request in a timely and responsive manner. In my view, Government officials, including White House aides, should not be criticized just for having discussions with private individuals from any walk of life. The question here is whether the particular discussions that Mr. Meese and his staff had with General Dynamics raise any clouds of suspicion. In view of the circumstances, the timing and frequency of the meetings and conversations with General Dynamics, I believe there is reason to be suspicious.

The information provided by Mr. Meese raises additional questions that need to be answered in view of the number of meetings and contacts that occurred and their timing.

For example, at the August 7, 1981, meeting, General Dynamics apparently was attempting to get the White House to intervene in a dispute between it and the Secretary of Defense over the Trident Program. Mr. Meese states that he decided he would call Secretary Weinberger to try to arrange a meeting between the parties.

WHY DID GENERAL DYNAMICS GO TO ED MEESE?

One question is, Why didn't General Dynamics go directly to Secretary Weinberger's office to arrange a meeting? Why did the company feel it needed to go through Ed Meese at the White House? Was there a hope on the part of General Dynamics that, when Ed Meese called Secretary Weinberger, it would be viewed as a not so subtle sign of White House favoritism? Did a phone call mean the White House was tilting toward General Dynamics?

Mr. Meese's account of the two meetings between his staff and Edward LeFevre of General Dynamics in October and December of 1981 are vague. Of the October meeting, it's stated that the subject was apparently the same as the August meeting. Of course, the August meeting was about the Trident construction program. The December meeting is described as "of a purely social nature."

What was actually discussed at these two meetings? If it is known that at least one of the meetings concerned the Trident program, why should it not be disclosed what was said about the Trident program? Is it only a coincidence that, at about the time of this meeting, the Navy began negotiating with General Dynamics over a new Trident contract?

On March 17, 1983, Mr. Meese met again with Ted LeFevre; this time, they discussed General Dynamics' interest in the cruise missile project.

On October 28, 1983, a member of Mr. Meese's staff had a telephone conversation with Edward LeFevre in which Mr. LeFevre was "seeking guidance on government help in selling F-16A's to our allies." According to Mr. Meese's letter, this was referred to the Foreign Military Sales Office at the State Department.

Again, we must ask: Why did General Dynamics repeatedly go to Ed Meese to discuss defense contracts and sales of its defense products?

Why did Ted LeFevre call Mr. Meese's office in January 1984 to try to get it to intervene with the Justice Department concerning a press release which General Dynamics wanted the Justice Department to issue?

These are a few of the unanswered questions surrounding Mr. Meese's contacts with General Dynamics. There are many other questions, such as whether Mr. Meese had similar dealings with other defense contractors or other firms seeking to do business with the Federal Government.

It is my view that Mr. Meese's nomination should not be acted upon until these questions are answered.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at the close of my remarks my correspondence with Mr. Meese.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
JOINT ECONOMIC COMMITTEE,
Washington, DC, January 18, 1985.

Mr. EDWIN MEESE III,
Counselor to the President, the White House, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. MEESE: You may be aware that I have been investigating Navy shipbuilding contracts with the General Dynamics Corporation. According to press accounts, you met with David Lewis, General Dynamics' Chairman of the Board, at the White House on at least one occasion in 1981 to discuss the company's problems with the Navy. I am requesting the following information:

1. A listing of any meetings or telephone conversations since January 1981 between yourself or members of your staff and Mr. Lewis and any other officials or employees of General Dynamics, including lawyers and consultants representing the firm.

2. The dates and purposes of any such meetings or telephone conversations.

3. A listing of any meetings or telephone conversations since January 1981 between yourself or members of your staff and Navy Secretary John Lehman or other Navy officials concerning Navy contracts with General Dynamics.

4. The dates and purposes of any such meetings or telephone conversations.

5. A listing of any meetings or telephone conversations since January 1981 between yourself or members of your staff and Attorney General William French Smith or other Justice Department officials concerning General Dynamics.

6. The dates and purposes of any such meetings or telephone conversations.

Please provide this information no later than January 29, 1985. Your cooperation will be greatly appreciated.

Sincerely,

WILLIAM PROXMIRE,
Vice Chairman, Subcommittee on International Trade, Finance, and Security Economics.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, January 28, 1985.

Hon. WILLIAM PROXMIRE,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR PROXMIRE: In response to your January 18, 1985 letter, I attach information derived from a search of my office records. You will note that neither I nor my staff ever had any contact with the Department of Justice regarding any matter concerning General Dynamics, other than recent routine briefings for my current confirmation hearings.

Indeed, you will see that my staff refused a request by General Dynamics that a call be made to the Department of Justice in support of a report for a favorable press release in January 1984. This refusal was considered so routine and so in accordance with my standard instructions that the matter was never even raised with me.

Sincerely,

EDWIN MEESE III,
Counselor to the President.

RESPONSE TO QUESTIONS OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

QUESTIONS 1 AND 2

A. Meetings with Edwin Meese

1. August 7, 1981 meeting for 15 minutes between Edwin Meese, Edwin Thomas (Meese's assistant), David Lewis (chairman of General Dynamics), and Edward LeFevre (a General Dynamics executive). Lewis and LeFevre told Meese that a conflict regarding problems in constructing the trident submarine had arisen between the Secretary of Defense and General Dynamics. Mr. Meese decided the White House would not become involved in the circumstances of the dispute, but that he would call Secretary Weinberger to determine the possibility of arranging a meeting between the parties.

2. March 17, 1983 meeting for 15 minutes between Edwin Meese and Edward LeFevre. LeFevre apprised Meese of General Dynamics' interest in the cruise missile project. Meese received this as information only and took no action.

B. Meetings with Meese's staff

1. October 14, 1981 meeting between Robert Garrick, then Meese's Deputy, and Edward LeFevre. The only record of this meeting is a secret service clearance into the White House, but the subject was apparently the same as the August 7, 1981 meeting described above.

2. December 22, 1981 meeting between James E. Jenkins, Deputy Counselor to the President, and Edward LeFevre that was of a purely social nature (Jenkins and LeFevre have known each other for 30 years).

3. May 7, 1984 meeting between Edward LeFevre and James Jenkins to secure a reference concerning someone LeFevre was considering for employment.

C. Telephone conversations with Edwin Meese

Our records revealed no telephone conversations between Edwin Meese and General Dynamics officials (or employees, lawyers, consultants).

D. Telephone conservations with Meese's staff

1. 26 August 1981 telephone conversation between Robert Garrick and Edward LeFevre. The purpose appears to be a follow-up to the 7 August 1981 meeting.

2. There were six telephone conversations between James Jenkins (Mr. Meese's Deputy at the time) and Edward LeFevre:

4 February 1982: concerning a social invitation.

18 April 1983: concerning setting up a meeting between Jenkins and LeFevre.

14 June 1983: asking Jenkins' assistance in having the Vice President accept a speaking invitation.

15 June 1983: same purpose as 14 June 1983 conversation.

15 September 1983: asking Jenkins' assistance in having the President attend launching of the trident submarine "Scoop Jackson".

28 October 1983: seeking guidance on government help in selling F-16A's to our allies. Jenkins referred this to the Foreign Military Sales Office at the State Department.

3. 19 January 1984 call from Ted LeFevre to Dorothy Kuhn, Assistant to James Jenkins. LeFevre had asked the Department of Justice to issue a press release saying that no charges against General Dynamics had resulted from the Department of Justice investigation, but DOJ refused. LeFevre wanted the White House to intervene. Miss Kuhn brought this up with Kenneth Cribb, Meese's Assistant. Cribb refused to place a call to DOJ or to interfere in any way on this matter.

QUESTIONS 3 AND 4

Our records revealed no such conversations or meetings.

QUESTIONS 5 AND 6

Our records revealed no meetings between Edwin Meese and Justice Department officials concerning General Dynamics. During the recent briefing process for confirmation hearings as Attorney General, the Justice Department advised Mr. Meese of Senator Grassley's interest in obtaining access to files on the ongoing investigation of the General Dynamics Electric Boat Division. Those briefings were as follows: (a) 20 December 1984 briefing by the Deputy Attorney General; (b) 6 January 1985 briefing by the Associate Attorney General; (c) 7 January 1985 briefing by the Acting Assistant Attorney General, Office of Legal Counsel.

DR. MENGELE'S VICTIMS SPEAK OUT

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the January 3 issue of the London Times included an article by Jerusalem correspondent Christopher Walker entitled "Jewish Twins To Expose Evil Experiments of Nazi Doctor." The subject of Mr. Walker's article is an upcoming Holocaust survivors conference which will feature a tragically extraordinary group of former inmates of the Nazi concentration camp at Auschwitz. The conference, scheduled to convene in early February, was described in advance by Mr. Walker as "one of the most macabre gatherings ever held to stir the world's conscience." The combined testimony of the survivors will constitute another gruesome page in the damning collection of evidence attesting to the barbaric actions of the Nazis, and, in particular, Dr. Josef Mengele, known to many as "The Angel of Death."

The spotlight at the conference in Jerusalem will be focused on 106 Auschwitz survivors who received special treatment at the death camp solely because they were accompanied by twin brothers or sisters. Most inmates at Auschwitz followed one of two paths: Rapid death in the gas chamber, or slow death via hard labor and starvation. The twins, however, were removed from the general camp population at the behest of the demonic Dr. Mengele, who used them as laboratory animals in a series of horrifying genetic experiments.

Now, 40 years after their nightmarish ordeal, more than half of the 180 known surviving twins have consented to join together and tell their stories.

According to one of the organizers of the conference, Mr. Aime Dahan:

Much of the evidence will be made public for the first time and will cover a range of the most dreadful acts. In some cases the twins have only agreed to speak if they are hidden from view behind a curtain.

Testimony will also be forthcoming from midgets, Jewish women, and other former human guinea pigs at Mengele's laboratory. The evidence against the Angel of Death will be presented to a special panel chaired by Dr. Gideon Hausner, the man who served as chief prosecutor at the trial of Adolf Eichmann. The panel also includes Prof. Telford Taylor, the chief prosecutor at the Nuremberg war trials, as well as the renowned Nazi hunter Simon Weisenthal. After the conclusion of the 3-day convention on February 6, the panel will prepare its conclusions for publication.

The Auschwitz survivors have agreed to undergo the painful process of a public discussion of their agonies. They have done so because they do not want the world to forget or remain ignorant of what took place at Auschwitz and the other death camps. Nor do they wish to absolve the monster who tortured them in the laboratory and sent their loved ones to untimely deaths. Dr. Mengele remains a fugitive from justice, and although he is widely believed to be living in Paraguay, no one has been able to conclusively determine his whereabouts. Mengele's victims hope that the worldwide publicity attendant upon the conference will help to change the current situation. In the words of Mr. Dahan,

The twins have decided that this may be their last chance to try and goad the international community to take action to find Mengele before he dies.

Irrespective of whether or not we punish yesterday's mass murderers and torturers, we must work diligently in an effort to deter the evildoers of tomorrow. This Chamber can help by consenting to ratification of the Genocide Convention. This simple but important first step has already been taken by more than 90 nations. After 35 years of delay, further foot-dragging would make a mockery of our claim to world leadership and it would also constitute an unconscionable injustice against the survivors of Auschwitz. I urge my colleagues to take immediate action on this vital issue.

NATIONAL RETAIL BAKERS WEEK

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I am certain that my colleagues join with me in saluting this Nation's retail bakers on the occasion of National Retail Bakers Week, which is being celebrated the week of February 25 through March 3, 1985.

America's retail bakeries are represented by the Retail Bakers of America, their national trade association. I am proud to say that both the current president of the association—Bob Hiller of the Rollin' Pin Bakery in Janesville—and the association's present treasurer and recent past president—Jim Grebe of Grebe's Bakeries in West Allis are outstanding Wisconsinites. Wisconsin will also host the retail bakers' annual convention next year in Milwaukee.

The State of Wisconsin is home to approximately 600 retail bakeries, which employ more than 70,000 persons and generate over $1 billion a year in payrolls alone. And, of course, Wisconsin hard rolls and kringles—thin, oval, flaky Danish creations—are famous throughout the United States and around the world.

Nationwide, there are some 32,000 retail bakeries, and the retail baking industry contributes a little over $8 billion a year to our national economy, not to mention the countless delicious and delightful products that we all enjoy so much.

Retail bakers are small businessmen who live, work, and serve in their local communities. They embody the spirit and dedication of those who founded and developed our great Nation. And they represent the kind of people who continue to help make the United States a world leader.

Mr. President, it is a privilege to pay tribute to all the retail bakers of America.

CAMPAIGN FINANCE REFORM

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I am introducing legislation to reform the Nation's campaign laws governing election to the U.S. Senate. This legislation would limit overall campaign spending, curb the influence of political action committees, and provide a 100-percent tax credit up to a specified limit for individual contributors to qualified candidates.

In the 1984 election, congressional candidates raised an estimated $350 million. In one Senate race alone, the two candidates raised more than $23 million. That is about $10 per vote. By themselves, these figures are startling. Examining a 10-year trend, however, makes them appear even more troubling. In 1974, congressional candidates collected about $77 million, compared to an estimated $350 million 10 years later. This 350-percent jump in campaign spending is matched by an increase in the Consumer Price Index of less than one-third that rate. Even after adjusting for inflation, campaign spending more than doubled over the past decade.

Some have argued that this flood of money pouring into congressional campaigns is not a cause for alarm. They point out that those who make and sell cosmetics spend far more for advertising than do congressional candidates while running for national office. I remain unconvinced by this argument, since the purpose of a campaign is to provide the electorate with enough information to learn about the issues and intelligently choose a candidate. Who can seriously state that today's voters are twice as well informed as those of a decade ago, even though candidates now spend more than twice as much on campaigning? We have reached the point in political campaigning where a candidate's most important decision is not necessarily his stand on the issues, but his choice of a media adviser.

Media-based campaigns are costly, which explains in large measure the rapid rise in campaign costs. Political action committees have been eager to help candidates meet these increasing costs. In 1972, PAC's contributed about 14 percent of the total raised in congressional campaigns. By 1984, however, that figure had more than doubled, reaching nearly 29 percent of total funding.

PAC money is not free, however; it has strings attached. Since PAC's represent specific economic or ideological interests, their campaign contributions help to advance specific interests rather than those of the general public. Paraphrasing from a recent article by Gregg Easterbrook in "The Atlantic Monthly," PAC representatives usually want only small favors—a vote on a bill, sometimes just a few words inserted into a regulation, or a different effective date on a tax provision. Because the favor requested is small and specific, legislators know that lobbyists will be watching closely to make sure that it is delivered. By the same token, they also know that very few voters will notice or care whether a technical change in the tax law is made retroactive to 1 year or to the year before.

We do have to keep in mind the rights of individuals and organizations to approach the Government. The first amendment to the Constitution, in addition to protecting free speech, religion, assembly, and the press, also prohibits Congress from abridging the right to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

I do not object to a political action committee having the right to present its case before Congress, or to exercise its right of free speech, or its right of making a campaign contribution as a reflection of its political choice. But, I do object to the steady, relentless, election-after-election increase in both the volume of PAC special interest contributions, and the proportion they represent of all contributions. The public interest is losing out. The average taxpayer, perhaps not sharing the concerns of the PAC, usually is not organized enough or does command sufficient resources to make his counter-case to his Member of Congress. That bothers me. I am afraid that the interest of the majority of Americans is being lost in the louder, more politically attuned clamor being raised by organized special interests.

Mr. President, I accepted no contributions for my last two campaigns in 1976 and 1982. In earlier campaigns, I did accept contributions. Believe me, I find it much easier to represent all the people of Wisconsin without having to raise a campaign war chest. Let us not kid ourselves. Campaign contributions do lead to an implied obligation. The American people realize this fact of political life.

Most Americans are cynical about Congress as an institution and little wonder, given the campaign financing system we tolerate. We now have an opportunity to reform this system before serious scandals erupt.

I am introducing reform legislation which contains three major provisions. First, my bill sets a strict limit on how much can be spent by a senatorial candidate in a general election $600,000 plus $0.05 for each voting-age resident of the State. Second, it provides that individual contributors to qualifying candidates be granted a 100-percent tax credit up to $200 for single returns, double that amount for joint returns. This is the best way I know to stimulate public interest in funding Senate races and simultaneously assert the general interest over that of the specialized, albeit vocal minority. Finally, the bill limits the amount of contributions a candidate can accept from PAC's to 30 percent of the spending limit. A study conducted for me last year by the Congressional Research Service shows that even with this limit on PAC funding the tax-credit system I am proposing would more than adequately have financed all 1980 Senate races. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the CRS study be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The time to act is now. Do we want the best Senate that money can buy or one that truly represents the interests of all Americans? Do we want the amount of money being spent on Senate campaigns to continue escalating precipitously or do we want to place it within some reasonable bounds? The position of the majority of Americans on these issues is abundantly clear. I urge the Senate to acknowledge that sentiment by acting this year to approve campaign reform legislation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of this bill and study be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill and the study were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 323

Subject: Estimation of Campaign Funds That Might Be Generated Under Proposed Campaign Finance Reform Legislation.

This memorandum is sent in response to your letter of January 19, and the subsequent conversations with your staff, regarding your proposed campaign finance reform legislation, to be patterned after H.R. 4428 (98th Congress, 1st Session).[1] The key feature of that proposal is the creation of a 100 percent tax credit for contributions by individuals to House candidates in the general election who agree to abide by specified limits on overall and personal campaign expenditures; the maximum credit would be $100 per candidate ($200 on joint returns) and $200 for all qualified candidates ($400 on joint returns). The intent of this provision is to encourage candidates to limit voluntarily their campaign expenditures in exchange for allowing their contributors to get a full refund of those donations—presumably a strong incentive to contribute. In line with your intention to propose a comparable bill for Senate elections, you posed the question: how much money can one reasonably expect to be generated in contributions to Senate candidates as a result of this plan, and to what extent will this amount cover the costs associated with Senate campaigns?

Federal law currently permits a 50 percent tax credit of the value of all political contributions in a calendar year, up to a maximum credit of $50 on single and $100 on joint returns (only contributions by individuals are eligible); qualifying contributions may be to candidates for Federal, State or local office, as well as to political parties and political action committees. Under H.R. 4428, the current tax credit would be continued, but with two changes: contributions to House candidates would no longer be eligible (in view of the separate credit specifically for that purpose), and the credit could only be taken in even-numbered years for that and the previous year's political contributions. My assumption is that your proposed bill—as the companion bill to H.R. 4428—would apply only to Senate candidates.

At the outset, I must caution that an analysis of this nature is necessarily based to a large extent upon assumptions, estimates and projections. While I believe my assumptions are valid ones, I am aware that different conclusions would result from different initial judgments in this study.

In evaluating the question you have posed, we are concerned not with the amount of revenue lost to the Federal treasury (a question economists are often called upon to analyze[2]) but rather with the amount of campaign funds generated to Senate campaign coffers. One is faced with several unknown factors, including: how will the increased rate of the credit from 50 to 100 percent affect the participation rate among the taxpayers; how many people who generally make political contributions might shift them to Senate candidates because of the 100 percent return on their money; and what will the average donation be—in view of the doubling of both the rate of credit and the maximum amount per candidate.

Rather than attempting the estimation of factors which are virtually imponderable, we will begin by posing the question: what is the current rate of participation of people claiming the tax credit for contributions to Senate candidates? Here we can examine data available from the Internal Revenue Service on the current political contributions tax credit, and from the Federal Election Commission and academic sources on campaign finances; we can then make certain assumptions based thereon.

From IRS data for any given year, we can determine the amount of money claimed in such credits and the number and percentage which claimed the credit. The IRS data do not reveal anything, however, regarding the beneficiaries of the contributions for which credits were claimed. We have no way of knowing how much was claimed for contributions to Senate candidates or to any other category of political candidate or entity for which donations are eligible for the tax credit. Only by estimating the proportion of credits claimed for contributions to Senate candidates among all political credits can we make informed guesses as to how much campaign money will be generated by establishing a separate credit with more favorable terms.

The fundamental assumption on which this analysis is based is that the amount of credits claimed under the current system for contributions to Senate candidates is in the same proportion to total credits claimed as the amount spent on Senate campaigns is to the total spent on all campaigns. Ideally, we would want to know how much was raised rather than spent because it correlates more directly with political contributions; however, we do not have such data or even estimates thereof at all levels of political campaigns, and receipts and expenditures are roughly the same for most categories (the major exception is probably political parties). Also, we would ideally like to know how much of the total raised (or spent) by candidates or committees came from individuals, as only such contributions are eligible for tax credits. At the Federal level, the Federal Election Commission data does not reveal this, although estimates can be attempted; campaign spending information for State and local elections is based wholly on such estimates.

By comparing Senate campaign spending with campaign spending at all levels in a given election year, one can get a reasonable idea of the proportion of political money that went specifically to Senate campaigns. The year 1980 was chosen for this analysis because it is the most recent election year for which we have complete IRS data on tax credit usage and also for which we have a fairly authoritative estimate—with relevant breakdowns—on political spending in the United States. For the latter information, I relied largely on the work of Herbert Alexander, Director of the Citizens' Research Foundation and a Professor at the University of Southern California, who is widely regarded as one of the foremost experts on campaign finance in this country. Of particular relevance to us is Dr. Alexander's compilation of election costs at all levels in 1980, a study which is widely regarded as authoritative. Alexander began his cost study with spending data reported by candidates and committees to the Federal Election Commission, organized the information into more usable categories, eliminated duplication in the assignment of financial activity to particular categories, and made estimates for other kinds of spending not required to be reported to the FEC; perhaps of greatest interest are his estimates of spending at the State and local levels, information not reported to the FEC and which, because of wide variations in disclosure systems at these levels, is impossible to ascertain.

For purposes of this analysis, I am presenting Table 4-1 from Alexander's Financing the 1980 Election (Lexington, D.C. Heath & Co., 1983), along with adjustments I have made to estimate Senate campaign spending attributable to individual contributions. Because large amounts of money entered the political system (and thus were spent) from public funds and from parties and interest groups, these amounts must be subtracted in order to best gauge the level of individual contributions (subject to political tax credits). Using supplementary data presented by Alexander in Chapter Four of his book and by other sources, I have made an effort to isolate to a large extent campaign spending in 1980 that can be attributed to individual contributions. Table 1, which follows, presents Alexander's data from his Table 4-1 in the first two columns with my adjustments in the second two columns. This is the first step in this exercise.

[1] Some 26 States allow direct corporate contributions and 40 States allow direct labor contributions to State and local candidates; the 25-percent exclusion for labor and corporate money is probably quite conservative, especially in view of State and local PAC's augmenting the direct corporate and union involvement in campaigns.

[2] Some 17 States provide some form of public financing in statewide (and legislative) races.

The $817 million figure from Table 1 is, of course, based to a large extent on subjective judgments as to the relevance of including certain financial activity. The final figure may be overstated a bit by virtue of its including some $19 million in State and local party spending on behalf of Presidential candidates (much of which might have come from corporate and labor sources); on the other hand, this was probably greatly outweighed by the fact that the $55 million listed as national party expenditures is well below the $121.6 million in net receipts by such committees reported by the FEC (after excluding $2.6 million from PACs and $21.2 million contributed to or spent on behalf of candidates).

The second step of our analysis is to examine the level of Senate campaign spending in 1980, in order to complete the other half of the equation. In the following table, the spending data is presented, with adjustments for receipts which were clearly from sources other than individuals.

TABLE 2.—CAMPAIGN EXPENDITURES BY SENATE CANDIDATES IN 1980, WITH ADJUSTMENTS FOR CAMPAIGN RECEIPTS BY PAC'S, PARTIES AND CANDIDATES

[2] In 1980, the FEC ended its practice of reporting aggregate data on the level of candidate support for their own campaigns. Political scientist Gary Jacobson reported that the level ranged from .4 to 12 percent between 1972 and 1978; hence the 5 percent estimate here (which is probably a low figure).

U.S. Federal Election Commission. FEC Releases Final Statistics on 1979–80 Congressional Races (press release). March 7, 1982.

The third step involves dividing the Senate spending figure from Table 2 ($79.3 million) by the overall spending figure from Table 1 ($816.7 million), resulting in a figure of 9.7 percent; we will round this off to 10 percent. It is also worth noting that the period of time covered in the overall spending data and the Senate data was the same—1979–1980.

Step Four is to examine the information from the Internal Revenue Service on the use of the political tax credit in 1980. The relevant information for all tax years from 1972–1981 is provided in Appendix 1 of this memorandum; all of this information is drawn from the IRS publication, "Statistics of Income; Individual Income Tax Returns" from each of those years. In 1980, a total of $269,384,000 was claimed in tax credits for political contributions (this amount was for contributions made during the election year of 1980). Taking 10 percent of the total credits, one arrives at a figure of $26.9 million dollars which can be assumed to have been taken for contributions to Senate candidates. Because that amount was yielded by a 50 percent credit, the total yield in contributions would have been $53.9 million. This represents just over one-half of all money spent by Senate candidates in 1980.

But taking into account only money claimed as credits in 1980 does not suffice when one is considering an election cycle that covers a two-year period. The problem with simply adding in the 1979 credits as well is the unknown amount of money spent on State and local elections which were held in 1979. For our purposes, we will arbitrarily assume that one-half of political money contributed in 1979 was spent in the 1980 elections (probably a very low figure). One-half of the $193,500,000 claimed in political credits in 1979 equals $96,750,000; ten percent of that equals $9,675,000; doubling that figure for credits to account for the full contribution yields a figure of $19.4 million. Adding the $53.9 million from 1980 to the $19.4 million from 1979 yields a total of $73.3 million which we assume would have filled Senate campaign coffers in 1979–1980. This, of course, represents about three-fourths of all money spent on Senate campaigns in 1980; another 18 percent of Senate campaign money in 1980 came from PACs and parties.

Examining this question from the perspective of participation, we know from Appendix 1 that 5.8 percent of tax returns claimed the credit in 1980 and 4.4 percent claimed it in 1979. If we assume that 10 percent took the credit for Senate contributions, we get a participation rate of 0.58 percent in 1980 and 0.44 percent in 1979. In 1980, 0.58 percent of the 93,902,000 returns filed equals 544,632 returns; the average credit (divide $269,384,000 by the number of returns claiming the credit—5,419,000) was $49.71—rounded off to $50. If the average credit was $50, the average contribution was $100; 544,632 multiplied by $100 yields $54.5 million. Following the same procedure for 1979, 0.44 percent of 92,694,000 returns is 407,854 returns; the average credit ($193,500,000 divided by the 4,069,000 returns claiming the credit) was $47.55—rounded off to $48. If the average credit was $48, the average contribution was $96; 407,854 multiplied by $96 yields $39.2 million; assuming only one-half of political money was for 1980 races leaves us with $19.6 million. Adding $54.5 million to $19.6 million gives us $74.1 million, virtually the same as the $73.3 million derived by our first methods of calculation. Henceforth, we will use the figure of $74 million (a rounded off average of these two figures).

This analysis suggests that the existing 50 percent tax credit probably yielded enough money to cover Senate candidate expenditures (when combined with a reasonable level of party and PAC money), even without factoring in the likely additional participation because of the availability of a full credit and because of the much higher limits on the credit amounts. One more exercise ought to be undertaken to test the thesis in light of the specific features of your intended proposal. The first feature which we have not considered until now is that the tax credit would only be available for contributions to general election candidates who abide by specific spending limits. All of our calculations and assumptions have been based on the full election cycle, including financial activity by candidates who were defeated in primaries and money spent in primaries by candidates who competed in general elections. Ideally, we would like to know how much money was spent only in general elections, particularly in view of your (and other) proposal(s) to limit general election expenditures. Unfortunately, the FEC does not report, and probably cannot report with great accuracy, spending information broken down into primary and general elections. The closest they come is to separate out primary losers, leaving financial activity only by candidates who competed in the general election (but including their receipts and expenditures in the primaries, as well). It should be noted that there is a potential logistical problem in attempting to impose limits only on general election expenditures. Just where does one draw the line between spending for the primary and spending for the general election?

Because this analysis is by its very nature based on speculation and assumption, however, we will bypass this complication with no further comment beyond noting its reality. Looking at the data, we find that in 1980, the FEC reported net expenditures of $102.9 million by all candidates for the Senate but $75.2 million by just those candidates who ran in the general election. We can only estimate the amount of money spent specifically in general elections. If one-fourth of all Senate spending was by primary losers, let us assume that another one-fourth was spent by primary winners; hence we assume that one-half of all Senate expenditures in 1980 occurred in the general election per se. All of our previous calculations should be halved, leaving us with $37 million in tax credits for Senate candidates in general elections in 1980 (half of $74 million).

The second feature of your intended proposal, which we have not yet addressed, is the specific spending limits you have in mind. Rather than $102.9 million actually spent in 1980 (or $51.5 million we assume was spent in the general election alone), your bill would have limited this spending in conjunction with the 100 percent tax credits. Because you are considering the same limits as are incorporated in your S. 151 (98th Congress, 1st Session), I have calculated what those limits would have been in the 1980 Senate races and what the aggregate spending would have been had each major candidate spent up to the limit. Table 3 presents this information.

Source: U.S. Census Bureau. Projections of the Population of Voting Age for States: November 1980. Series P-25, No. 879. March 1980. p. 6.

From Table 3, we learn that total spending in Senate general elections would have been roughly $52 million, had each major candidate spent the maximum under the limits in your bill, S. 151. We can compare this with the $37 million in contributions claimed by individuals for contributions to Senate candidates in the 1980 general election under the 50 percent credit. In other words, 71 percent of the money needed to wage those campaigns emanated from individuals participating in the 50 percent tax credit system. When one considers another feature of S. 151, that candidates may accept up to 30 percent of their spending limit from political action committees, it appears that more than sufficient funds would have been generated by the 100 percent credit, even if the participation rate did not rise. And, of course, given the role of the political parties in the funding equation, the individual role seems especially ample for the purpose of adequately funding Senate campaigns.

One final factor that has not been considered is the answer to a question posed earlier: how will the rate of participation be affected by the shift from a 50 percent to a 100 percent credit, to what extent will this change prove a greater incentive to contributing? In my conversations with an economist at the Joint Committee on Taxation, I learned that there do not appear to be any reliable formulas for making such forecasts. The lack of experience with 100 percent credits is a major factor in this situation.

It is also quite difficult to draw definitive conclusions from the Nation's twelve years of experience with the tax credit system, data for the first ten years of which appears in Appendix 1. From 1972 until 1979, taxpayers had a choice of the 50 percent credit or a full deduction for their political contributions. From 1972–1974, the maximum credit was $12.50 ($25 on joint returns) and the maximum deduction was $50 ($100 on joint returns); the maximum amounts for both credit and deduction were doubled, effective 1975, and the maximum credit was doubled again while the deduction was eliminated, effective 1979. Thus there have been three different sets of rules governing the tax incentive system, with the tax credit alone available only for the third (and current) phase. Moreover, as indicated in Appendix 1, we do not have data on the use of the tax deduction for the years 1974, 1976, and 1978, because the IRS only made such calculations in alternate years; as election years, participation would have undoubtedly been higher than off-years, as well.

In 1973, 1975, and 1977, participation in the deduction system added 0.8 percent to the combined participation rate. If we assume that participation in the succeeding election years would have been one percent higher with the deduction data included (one rather than 0.8 percent because it was in an election year), the estimated participation rates for 1974, 1976, and 1978 would have been respectively, 2.2, 2.7, and 3.8. Based on this assumption, we can take an average of the participation rates in each of the three phases of the tax incentive program. Hence, the average rate from 1972–1974 is 2.8 percent, the average from 1975–1978 is 3.8 percent, and from 1979–1981 is 5.2 percent. If one sees the terms of the incentive as having been made more attractive to taxpayers in each succeeding phase (arguable in view of the elimination of the deduction in 1979), one might draw the conclusion that participation increased with each upgrading of the incentives, registering an increase of 1 percent and, then, 1.4 percent.

If we are correct in asserting that participation probably did increase with the doubling of the maximum credits, it is probably not unreasonable to speculate on a comparable increase with the doubling of the percentage of contributions eligible for the credit. Any additional participation would add to our confidence that your proposal would provide more than enough funds for Senate candidates in general elections.

In conclusion, I must reiterate that the analysis in this memorandum is necessarily based on numerous assumptions and on estimates. However, if errors in judgment were made regarding these imprecise quantities, I made every effort to err on the side on being too conservative in my assessments or projections. In any event, the results of the analysis might differ from those derived from other assumptions or estimates.

I trust you will find this analysis helpful in your consideration of this proposed legislation. I am ready to assist you in any way possible in this matter and can be reached at 287-8646.

[2] Because the IRS did not provide data regarding use of the political tax deduction in these (even-numbered) years, these percentages only reflect participation in the tax credit system. They would be higher if the tax deduction participation could be included, particularly in view of likely increases thereof during election years.

Note: From 1972–74, taxpayers could claim either a 50-percent credit up to $12.50 ($25 on joint returns) or a full deduction of up to $50 ($100 on joint returns)—Public Law 92–178. From 1975–78, taxpayers could claim a 50-percent credit up to $25 ($50 on joint returns) or a full deduction of up to $100 ($200 on joint returns)—Public Law 93–443. Since 1979, taxpayers could claim a 50-percent credit of up to $50 ($100 on joint returns); the deduction was eliminated—Public Law 95–600.

HOME EQUITY CONVERSION FOR THE ELDERLY

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, today I am introducing a bill that would enable elderly homeowners to maintain residency while converting the equity in their homes into income at the same time.

I introduced similar legislation in the 97th (S. 3045) and 98th Congresses (S. 831 and S. 1914). These bills have attracted considerable interest and have had the benefit of review and comment by a number of home equity conversion experts. The Treasury Department has also testified to S. 1914's insignificant revenue loss potential at hearings held before the Senate Taxation and Debt Management Subcommittee, and my legislation has since been modified to address the other concerns raised by Treasury at and subsequent to those hearings. The measure I introduce today provides a comprehensive, widely supported approach to assisting America's fast-growing elderly population who are house rich and cash poor.

Our elderly homeowners who must live on fixed incomes are often faced with a cruel choice. Confronted by ever-rising living costs, they must either reduce their standard of living, or sell their most precious asset, their home, to pay their bills.

The trauma of losing a home for which a person has worked a lifetime is profound. The alternative, however, is equally dismaying: Living out one's last years—the allegedly golden ones—in materially constrained circumstances. It is an alternative no elderly homeowner should have to face if an alternative can be devised.

My bill facilitates sale-leaseback arrangements for home equity conversion for the elderly. Under this arrangement, rather than having to sell for funds to meet living expenses and then moving into an apartment, the elderly homeowner can sell to a financial institution but continue to live in his or her own home for the balance of his or her life.

Tax barriers to sale-leaseback would be eliminated by this legislation. First, the elderly homeowner in the sale-leaseback transaction would be entitled to a one-time capital gains tax exemption that is otherwise available to homeowners past the age of 55 who sell their homes. And second, the purchaser/lessor could take depreciation on the value of the property it had purchased although the seller retains occupancy rights.

With these tax barriers removed, I am confident that the sale-leaseback transaction will prove attractive to financial institutions.

The President's Commission on Housing has estimated the potential market for these home equity transactions to be between $30 and $40 billion. And the Commission has said that this market can be expected to increase as the number of older Americans increases and the idea of home equity conversion gains acceptance.

My bill, S. 1914, was considered by the Senate Finance Committee during its markup on deficit reduction proposals held during February and March 1984. On March 21, 1984, the committee passed a deficit reduction proposal that included a section based on S. 1914; several substantive modifications were made, however. Certain restrictions were added which excluded from the safe harbor provision transactions between related parties, set allowable depreciation at a 40-year straight-line basis, and precluded tax shelters from being purchasers in sale-leaseback transactions. There was concern that these restrictions would make it more difficult for elderly homeowners to convert their equity in real estate into cash. I believe that such restrictions are unnecessary and have not included them in the bill I am introducing today.

The residential sale-leaseback section of the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984 was passed on April 12, 1984, after one of the detrimental Finance Committee modifications was removed, pursuant to my amendment, on the Senate floor. The House deficit reduction bill did not include a sale-leaseback provision, and the conference committee for the tax bills subsequently dropped the Senate provision.

Mr. President, access to the rewards of home equity—which has been dearly earned—should be given to our elderly Americans during their lifetimes. It is of no value to them after their deaths. And it will go a long way toward making their last years truly golden ones.

This legislation will make sale-leasebacks feasible. It will make the arrangement attractive both to the elderly homeowner and to the purchasing financial institution.

This legislation has had the support of all known experts in the field of home equity conversions, the Federal Council on Aging, numerous other senior citizens' groups, and the financial investment community.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of my bill, and an article that appeared in the Washington Post describing my bill as a "Win-Win Tax Bill for Everyone," be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill and article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

That this Act may be cited as the "Home Equity Conversions Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. DEPRECIATION IN SALE-LEASEBACK TRANSACTIONS.

Section 167 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to depreciation) is amended by inserting after subsection (h) the following new subsection:

"(i) SALE-LEASEBACK TRANSACTIONS.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—In the case of property involved in a sale-leaseback transaction, the purchaser-lessor shall be recognized as the absolute owner of the property, and the deduction shall be allowed to the purchaser-lessor.

"(2) DEFINITIONS.—For purposes of this subsection—

"(A) SALE-LEASEBACK.—The term 'sale-leaseback' shall include the transaction in which—

"(i) the seller-lessee—

"(I) has attained the age of 55 before the date of such transaction,

"(II) sells property which during the 5-year period ending on the date of the transaction has been owned and used as a principal residence by such seller-lessee for periods aggregating 3 years or more,

"(III) obtains occupancy rights in such property pursuant to a written lease requiring a fair rental, and

"(IV) receives no option to repurchase the property at a price less than the fair market price of the property unencumbered by any leaseback at the time such option is exercised, and

"(ii) the purchaser-lessor—

"(I) is a person,

"(II) is contractually responsible for the risks and burdens of ownership and receives the benefits of ownership (other than the seller-lessee's occupancy rights) after the date of such transaction, and

"(III) pays a purchase price for the property that is not less than the fair market price of such property encumbered by a leaseback, and taking into account the terms of the lease.

"(B) OCCUPANCY RIGHTS.—The term 'occupancy rights' means the right to occupy the property for any period of time, including a period of time measured by the life of the seller-lessee on the date of the sale-leaseback transaction (or the life of the surviving seller-lessee, in the case of jointly-held occupancy rights), or a periodic term subject to a continuing right of renewal by the seller-lessee (or by the surviving seller-lessee, in the case of jointly-held occupancy rights).

WIN-WIN TAX BILL FOR EVERYONE

(By Kenneth R. Harney)

A new legislative proposal pending before Congress would open the way for tens of thousands of homeowners across the country to pull tax-free dollars from their houses, without moving or taking out a mortgage.

The same bill, which stands a good chance of becoming part of Capitol Hill's major 1984 tax and revenue package, also would allow thousands of individual private investors to acquire single-family rental properties on advantageous terms.

The proposal is known as the "Home-Equity Conversion Act," and is sponsored by Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.). What it seeks to do is remove some of the technical glitches in the current federal tax code that prevent widespread use of a technique called the residential "sale-leaseback."

Although it sounds forbidding, the sale-leaseback concept is straightforward in essence: The owner of a home sells his or her property to a buyer who agrees to rent it back to the seller on reasonable terms for an extended period of time.

The sellers can receive payment for the house in hefty monthly installments say, $1,000 every 30 days—or can walk away with a full, tax-free cash settlement up front on sale profits up to $125,000.

The buyers, for their part, typically get a significant discount on the acquisition price of the property, a low down payment, and cut-rate mortgage-interest costs.

To illustrate, let's say a husband and wife in their late sixties own their home, but are "cash poor." Their retirement income barely lets them scrape by. They can't enjoy anywhere near the standard of living they did when they were younger. They worry about how they'll fare in the coming years.

The couple realizes that its house represents its major financial asset. But neither spouse wants to pack up and move. The equity money needed to change their life style is frozen inside their house, but the couple sees no way to make it liquid. Enter the sale-leaseback.

Under the broad terms of Specter's equity-conversion bill, the couple could sell the house to an outside investor—let's say a young, high-income husband and wife living in the same town.

The older couple could sell for an all cash price, or more likely, finance the sale themselves using an installment contract. That would entail a modest cash down payment by the purchasers, say 10 percent—and a 10- or 15-year note held by the sellers carrying a mutually acceptable fixed interest rate, such as 11 percent in today's market.

The sellers would give up legal title to the property, but they would get an iron-clad lease guaranteeing them occupancy of the home for life, if they chose, on advantageous rental terms.

Each month, the young buyers and the elderly sellers would exchange money: The buyers would send a fat installment check to the elderly couple as principal and interest on their purchase agreement. The sellers would in turn send a more modest rental payment to the new owners of the house.

Properly structured, the transaction would generate a steady cash inflow to the elderly couple. A house sold for $120,000 and financed via a sale-leaseback of this type would put $1,031 into the elderly couple's wallet every 30 days, according to figures from the nonprofit National Center for Home-Equity Conversion, a supporter of the Specter bill. A house sold for $90,000 and leased back would generate $773 a month for the couple. And a $60,000 sale-leaseback would produce a net $511 every month.

If the sellers chose, they also could buy an interest-bearing annuity that would mature after the mortgage-payment flow stopped, thereby guaranteeing term cash to pay the rent indefinitely.

The investor couple, for their part, would get a sizable discount on the sale price of the home perhaps 20 percent—plus below-market financing. They'd also get reponsible, stable tenants and hefty annual federal tax write-offs for depreciation, interest and other costs.

Sale-leasebacks of this type could well prove to be an important economic answer for large numbers of elderly homeowners in the coming two decades. And, because preliminary Treasury Department projections show no significant revenue losses to the government from such transactions. Specter's amendments could be one of those rarest of legislative vehicles: a "win-win" bill for everybody involved.

THE 1984 TRADE DEFICIT

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, the announcement today of an all time record 1984 trade deficit of $123.3 billion is truly astounding, but, unfortunately, not unexpected. Each of the last 3 years, we have set one of these regrettable records. The Department of Commerce has been warning us of this event for a year. Indeed, everyone in the administration and in American business and in American labor have known about this trade deficit for a long time. We in the Finance Committee have been taking the pulse of this problem and have been reporting about it regularly to the Senate for years. We have been telling the Senate and the country that trade is no longer an arcane backwater of American policy, but the cutting edge of our economy.

We have a long pull ahead of us. This trade deficit has become structural, affected not just by our budget deficit but by our national investment policies, our tax policies, and above all our trade policies.

People said back in 1979, "Wait until we get our currencies back in balance"—but now, 5 or 6 years later, we are seeing 30 and 40 percent disparity between the yen and the dollar, great disparity between the D-mark and the dollar. People say, "Once that is corrected, all these problems are going to go away." Do not believe it.

Is the increased relative value of the dollar part of the problem? Of course it is. But to say that the dollar's strength is the only cause, and nothing else, could not be more wrong. Structural problems are developing that will cause this trade deficit to continue, regardless of whether we can return to balance in our currencies. Moreover, who is to tell us what that balance is any more? That balance is made up of many things. Part of it is the U.S. budget deficit. Part of it is the difference between the interest rates in Japan and Germany, where there is as much as a 2-percent difference in the prime rates. Part of the value of the dollar is due to the safety and stability of this country—billions of dollars are coming here for a safe harbor. So we have a long pull ahead of us, trying to turn the trade deficit around.

We can see evidence of the structural nature of the current trade deficit over the last 10 years. We have had double-digit trade deficits each year for the last 10 years, a total of $450 billion in trade deficits. That has to mean jobs going overseas, jobs lost from this country.

It may amaze some Senators that notwithstanding this trade deficit history, I am not a protectionist. I do not believe in closing down America and going it alone. I believe in expanding trade, and that means free trade. But our trade policies, in my opinion, no longer reflect reality. They reflect a myth that as we have lowered our trade barriers, other countries have done the same; as we have reduced our subsidies, other countries have done the same. The truth is that the world is now crawling with subsidies, preferences, cartels, and every other conceivable form of market distortion imaginable. Strange as it may seem, by not paying attention to trade policy, the administration has actually become more protectionist than any other administration in recent history. President Reagan's protection of textiles and motorcycles and steel and automobiles was forced upon him by inevitable pressures, which he might have resisted if he had been able to see through the free trade mythology, to the real world of trade.

What we need today is a trade strategy, not a trade mythology.

Let me give an example of what is happening: Let us take a look at agriculture. If you talk to people in the European Common Market as I did in visiting with the Trade Minister of France or with Mr. Mitterand a couple months ago, you will find they think we distort trade as much as they do. If you start talking about their subsidies, they will reply, "Well, you have subsidies in your country; you have subsidies for agriculture."

Yes, we do. But there is a great difference in the approach of the European Common Market to agricultural subsidies and subsidies within this country.

In the European Common Market, the subsidies are there to increase production, and thereby to add to the surpluses. They export these surpluses, in order to take over markets outside of the European Common Market.

The difference in the subsidies in this country for agriculture is that they are designed to curtail production.

When I talked to the French Trade Minister, I found that this is a point he does not like to admit.

But let me tell you how it works. Let me give you an example on sugar. Today, the European Common Market pays a farmer in the European Common Market 27 cents a pound for sugar. You know what they sell it for on the world market? Five cents.

That means the European Common Market taxpayer subsidizes their farmer to that extent. It has resulted in an incredible increase in production. Why should it not under those conditions?

The value of an acre of land in France devoted to sugar beet production has gone from $1,000 to $7,000. That is the kind of medallion that has been placed over French land.

In contrast, what did you see on the network news last night? Auctioneers selling out U.S. farmers, and the value of their equipment and their land in a tailspin.

Something has to give. And it is the American farmer that is doing it. Once again he is among the most efficient farmers in the world. Today we are spending 16 percent of our disposable income on food. No other major nation in the world matches that.

And yet we cannot survive because our farmers cannot compete against the exports of other countries. They can compete against other farmers but not against government treasuries. And that is what they are being forced to do.

We look at the Japanese. They talk about free trade. But do you think there is free trade when it comes to trying to sell to Japan? When it comes to an automobile, that comes from Japan to this country, we accept factory certification by the Japanese factory. At most, we do some spotchecks with regard to safety and environmental protection.

Does it work the same the other way? No. They want to inspect individually every American car that lands on their shore. And by the time they get it all done, it is time for a model change.

Is it any wonder we have problems? And then they try to tell us: "Your things do not fit culturally with us." They argue, for example, that beef is not part of their culture.

How can they say that about beef?

There is a tremendous restriction on the importation of our beef into their country. They do not import beef except in minimal amounts.

And I am not sure that the cultural background of our beef is that much different from the cultural background of the beef they raise. You have the Japanese paying three times as much for sirloin strip as we pay in our country.

Open up the markets and that will give us a free trade.

That is not the way it is working.

What happens in Third World countries now?

The IMF—which I support, which I think is necessary, which this Government and its taxpayers support—goes into Third World countries and says, "You must stop these imports. You must increase your exports." And then these developing countries run into all the trade barriers in other industrial countries that we do. Where do those exports finally go? We take it. We are fueling the recovery for the world today, by this incredible increase of imported manufactured products.

What will the Japanese normally accept from us? They take logs. They do not want finished lumber. They will take raw materials. They do not want anything that requires a lot of labor. That is what they want to send us.

What do you call a country that ships its raw materials to another country and buys back finished products? You call that country a colony. We dumped a lot of tea in the harbor when we had that kind of relationship with England.

Now we have another country doing it to us. But this time it is Japan.

Twenty-seven countries now have an automobile local content requirement. Ninety percent of all trade barriers are not within the international rules. And worst of all, total world trade is not growing fast enough.

From 1963 to 1973, trade was truly the engine of growth on a worldwide scale, expanding in real terms some 2.5 percent per annum faster than production. From 1973 to 1982, taken as a whole, that margin has dropped to 1 percent, and in recent years the engine virtually stopped, in the sense that worldwide trade is no longer growing faster than worldwide production. In other words, trade is no longer that rising tide that lifts all the boats; instead, our imports are pulling the whole world along.

We have to restore growth by expanding total trade, not just our imports.

The minority leader has appointed a working group on trade policy, and I am chairman of that working group. I intend shortly to ask that group to begin a major study of American trade policy to try to come to grips with this kind of a deficit. I believe that part of the answer to be a new kind of toughness in trade policy by the American Government.

Let me give you an example: In 1982, the European Common Market agreed to limit its exports of pipes and tubes to the United States. It agreed to do so, not to protect the U.S. pipe and tube industry but because its steel manufacturers benefited from export subsidies. No one seriously questioned that. And export subsidies are unfair trade by anybody's definition.

Yet hardly before the ink was dry on that agreement, the European Community began exporting more than the limits, so that by the beginning of 1984, they were exporting pipe and tube at three times the rate in that agreement.

I sponsored legislation that simply authorized the administration to put a quota on those limits at the level of the pipe and tube agreement. And then I managed to extract from the administration a commitment that they would make that agreement work, no matter what. My amendment passed into law in the Omnibus Trade and Tariff Act of 1984 and that seemed to focus minds wonderfully.

The European Community had been negotiating about this trade agreement violation for 6 months, and once that law went into effect, Secretary Baldrige and Ambassador Brock, true to their word, advised the President to embargo imports of European pipe and tube on the ground that the European Community was not living up to their agreement. The embargo went into place and less than 1 month later, we negotiated a new pipe and tube arrangement which I believe has enough controls on it to work.

This experience and several others like it over the last several years have convinced me that progress on building a fair and reciprocal trade system is possible. But we just cannot negotiate from weakness. We have the tools to make a better trade world: our leadership, our vigorous and diverse market—there is no other market like it in the entire world; so we really have a major bargaining chip—there and our great natural and human resources.

There is a great risk in a tough trade policy. People say we are going to end up in a trade war. What do you think we are in? What are we being subjected to?

As we are learning from these devastating trade deficit figures, even greater risks lie in waiting for the rest of the world to adopt a free trade policy out of the goodness of their hearts. It will not just happen, and that is a reality.

I look forward to working with my Trade Policy Working Group colleagues. I believe we will produce a good and useful report. And I look forward to comments of all of my Senate colleagues concerning the announcement of the incredible trade deficit facing this country today.

Mr. President, I yield back the balance of my time.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR BAUCUS

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHAFEE). The Senator from Montana.

THE 1984 TRADE DEFICIT

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I would like to join with my colleague from Texas, Senator BENTSEN, for a few moments discussing the problems of our trade deficit.

Mr. President, in 1983, the President predicted "a future in which commerce will be king, the eagle will soar, and America will be the mightiest trading nation on Earth."

Well, commerce may be king, eagles may be soaring, but, unfortunately, they are not American eagles.

The U.S. trading position has never been worse, giving us a huge trade deficit that was almost unmanageable 4 years ago.

In the late 19th century, America began running a series of trade surpluses that lasted three-quarters of a century. Every year our country ran trade surpluses.

In the mid-1970's, not too many years ago, we began to run trade deficits which were fairly small and easily offset by capital inflows.

But in the past few years, our trade deficits have skyrocketed. Huge budget deficits attracted vast amounts of foreign capital. This, in turn, kept the dollar high and attracted a flood of foreign imports.

As a result, our recovery pulled other nations along—but, at what cost? We bought huge quantities of goods from Japan, Germany, and other nations. We helped their producers. But our own trade deficit almost doubled, from $32 billion in 1982 to $58 billion in 1983.

And yesterday came the news of another new record. Now America can claim the highest trade deficit in our country's history—$123 billion in 1984.

We bought $123 billion more than we sold. Or to put it another way, for every $1 worth of U.S. products going out, there is about $1.57 worth of foreign products coming in.

This is the flip side of the strong dollar. For Americans who travel abroad, a strong dollar is a godsend. I have recently noticed that Harrod's—the upscale London department store—is advertising in American newspapers. Americans are flocking to Europe to buy foreign goods.

But ask our farmers, timbermen, and manufacturers how they feel about the strong dollar. They have a different perspective.

You see, a trade deficit is not simply an abstract number for economists to play with. A trade deficit means lost jobs—millions of jobs, jobs in almost every State.

For example, in Butte, MT, the transformation has been stark. Butte was once the copper mining capital of the world. Today, every mine has closed. All 13,000 workers have lost their jobs to workers in Chile, Peru, and Zaire. And Butte, once our proudest city, has hit hard times. Its population has declined from 100,000 in 1920 to 30,000 people today.

Butte is not an isolated example.

Ask the people at Caterpillar tractor how they feel about the strong dollar.

A company whose quality and management are the envy of the modern world is losing sales and income to foreign competition, because of forces beyond its control.

As a result of situations like this, hundreds of communities, all across the country, have suffered the same fate as Butte—whether they produce steel, autos, or some other product; whether they are losing out to imports at home, or losing export sales abroad.

And there is more than just unemployment and painful short-term adjustments involved. The fact is, this trade deficit is threatening the survival of some of America's core industries.

And we are losing our foothold in critical export markets. As Federal Reserve Board member Henry Wallich told the Finance Committee last year:

> The longer exports remain depressed, the more difficult it becomes to maintain marketing networks, and the more costly and difficult it becomes to recover foreign sales.

What should America's response be?

Protectionism is not the answer. Ultimately, it will shrink the world economy and leave everyone worse off.

So what should we do?

First of all, as Martin Feldstein said last year:

> The appropriate remedy for the present trade deficit is to reduce the deficit in the Federal budget.

This budget deficit is increasing by $22 million an hour, inflating the international value of the dollar to make imports cheap and exports expensive. This is like slapping American exporters with a 35-percent tax and giving foreign importers a 35-percent import subsidy. No wonder American companies are having trouble competing.

I am hopeful that the Congress and the President will act this year to reduce that budget deficit. In fact, Mr. President, as you well know because of your position in the policy committee on the Republican side of the aisle, this has to be a bipartisan effort. The problem is so severe that this country can no longer afford the luxury of finger pointing and name calling, of each political party blaming the other, the President blaming the Congress and the Congress blaming the President.

The fact is, not only must the President and the Congress work together in every sense of the term, but Republicans and Democrats must work together in every sense of the term. It cannot be a charade. It has to be real; it has to be sincere.

In my judgment, Mr. President, if the Congress, the President, and Republicans and Democrats engage in a good faith, joint, bipartisan effort, we will get the budget deficit under control the way we know it should be.

Second, we must drive tougher bargains with our trading partners. America must stand tall in international trade—not just in the military arena.

Up until now, our trading partners have worn us down through painfully slow negotiations, followed by cosmetic concessions.

I say, enough is enough. When we negotiate with the Japanese, the EC, the Canadians, and others, we should demand more than good-faith negotiations. We should demand results, in the form of substantially increased U.S. sales.

Third, we must tighten up our own trade laws, so that we can compete fairly against subsidized foreign competition and adjust quickly to changed international conditions.

Fourth, we must tighten the rules governing the multilateral trading system; that is, the GATT.

GATT is riddled with loopholes. For example: the agricultural subsidy provision is feeble; the dispute resolution mechanism is slow and unwieldy; services are not covered at all.

It is high time that we held a new round of multilateral negotiations, to repair GATT so that it works for today's world and operates in the economic interest of the United States.

CONCLUSION

Mr. President, the hug trade deficit announced yesterday is deeply troubling.

In our hypercompetitive world, a country's balance of trade may be the most accurate indication of its fundamental economic strength.

If that is true—and I think it is—America faces a major challenge.

We have to turn those trade statistics around, so that they represent jobs created, not jobs lost.

It will not be easy. It will take a clear, rational trade policy.

As a member of the Democratic trade working group, I look forward to helping develop that policy, and making America a mighty trading nation once again.

TRADE POLICY

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, I want to take a few minutes today to discuss this very difficult issue facing the country; the issue of the trade deficit which was announced yesterday. The figures for 1984 were released yesterday, indicating a 1984 trade deficit of nearly $124 billion.

I firmly believe that unless we can get this problem under control, we shall see a systematic deterioration of our industrial capacity in this country; we shall see a systematic deterioration of our human capital in this country as we lose the skills that are needed to perform much of the productive work that is done in the world. I see the issue very plainly in my home State of New Mexico in several industries. I should like to take a few moments to point those out.

Mr. President, I am pleased to be a member of the Democratic Conference Working Group on Trade Policy and I am pleased to join with my Democratic colleagues in discussing the seriousness of our trade problems and means of remedying these problems.

In my opinion, the challenge for today, and for the remainder of this decade, is to take stock of our strengths and weaknesses, and put as our first priority restoring and maintaining America's competitive edge in the world economy. Today, we are in a world economy.

The average citizen in my State and the entire country today knows that we are in a world economy. That person, any of us today, is awakened by a Sony clock radio. We put on clothing made in China, Poland, Yugoslavia, or Taiwan. We step into imported shoes and possibly even drive an imported car or pickup to work. The price that we pay for gasoline, as we have heard in the last 24 hours, is greatly affected by how OPEC is succeeding in keeping its member nations from cutting the price of oil.

The simple fact is that many American companies—in fact, entire basic industries in this country—are being seriously damaged by international competition today. In consumer electronics, our share of the world market has fallen from 35 percent to 10 percent in the last 25 years. During that same period, our share of steel has dropped from 26 percent to 17 percent; automobiles from 44 percent to 23 percent; jet aircraft from 95 percent to 65 percent.

In New Mexico, my home State, we are all too aware of the precipitous decline in our mining industries, specifically uranium, copper, and potash.

In 1970 the United States had a gross national product which represented 30 percent of the gross world product and we had a trade surplus. By 1980, our GNP had fallen to 20 percent of gross world product and we had a trade deficit in 1984 of more than $120 billion.

We need to ask: What does this mean for the average American? Is this purely an economist's statistic or does this have real impact on the people of this country? As recently as 1968, our per capita income was the highest in the world. By 1980, we had fallen to 10th place. Adjusted for inflation, the average American worker earned less in 1982 than in the late 1960's.

I commend to my colleagues a new publication from the Harvard Business School. Profs. George C. Lodge and Bruce R. Scott put together a compilation of papers under the title "U.S. Competitiveness In The World Economy." I think it is a book that is very worthy of attention by Members of the Senate.

When we read the morning news and see that the recovery continues, it is perhaps hard to arouse concern about our economic competitiveness. But I am not talking about short-term trends over a few months or years. I am talking about the long-term trends which emerged in the early 1960's and which continue today.

There are many things we must do to be more competitive as a nation. But one of the more important things we must do is to develop a national trade and export strategy.

It has been at least half a century since trade has been a major issue in America. From 1891 to 1970 the United States enjoyed an almost unbroken string of trade surpluses with the rest of the world. That is, the rest of the world bought more from us than we bought from them.

Since 1970, that situation has reversed itself in a very dramatic way. In 1984, our trade deficit exceeded $123 billion. On its present course, it could reach $250 billion by 1989 and $300 billion by the early 1990's.

These figures are disturbing for two clear reasons. They indicate a relative decline in our industrial capacity, and they indicate that we are losing the skills that go with a productive society.

As America imports more and more, and exports less and less, we gradually lose the sources of production and, perhaps more important, we lose the skills that go along with a productive society. No nation can remain a net importer over a long period of time and also remain a major world power.

A. THE LOSS OF JOBS

The effect of our declining position in the world economy is already having significant impact here at home. More than 1.7 million jobs have been lost from 1980 to 1982. Many of these jobs are in heavy industry, which has been hardest hit by international competition. In 1972, 676,000 people in this country worked in auto factories. Ten years later, the number has slumped to 511,900.

This trade deterioration is not confined to heavy industry. In traditional strong sectors as foods, feeds, and beverages, our trade surplus dropped from $18.7 billion to $10.2 billion from 1981 to 1984, a 45-percent decline. In the service sector, a surplus of $41 billion in 1981 has declined to $22 billion in 1984, a $19 billion decrease in 3 years. Services decline combined with rising merchandise trade deficit has led to an estimated $100 billion current account deficit for 1984, according to statistics just released.

Similar declines are evident in the steel, rubber, and—in New Mexico—the mining industries.

B. IMPACT ON NEW MEXICO

The New Mexico mining industry has been particularly hard hit. In 1981, mining accounted for 6.6 percent of total employment in the State. Over the next 2 years, that fell to 4.4 percent as 10,000 jobs were lost. Since 1983, some 1,300 jobs have been regained, bringing total employment to about 21,500. But with the exception of the coal industry, mining in our State across the board—copper, potash, and uranium—is, as one industry official has said, "sick and depressed."

COPPER

Last spring, the ITC ruled that the copper industry had been injured by subsidized imports from Third World nations. The Commission recommended that the President grant trade relief. The President refused to follow the Commission's recommendations. The Senate then called upon the President to pursue voluntary restraint agreements with these countries in an attempt to reduce the amount of copper being dumped in the United States. The special Trade Representative has set up a copper task force to investigate the feasibility of such agreements. The task force is to report its recommendations by the end of this month. However, there is no reason to believe that these recommendations will be favorable to the industry.

I firmly believe that we must find some way to enter into voluntary restraint agreements with some of these other countries. Our remedy process must provide some type of arrangement to reduce the worldwide production.

POTASH

The Kerr McGee Co. announced earlier this month that it is closing its New Mexico operations in Lea County, resulting in the loss of approximately 500 jobs. Two other potash mines in the area closed earlier in this decade, and reductions in the remaining five operations have slashed employment from nearly 3,000 to approximately 1,990, under present arrangements. The potash industry has been severely hit in recent years by heavily subsidized foreign competition. Unfortunately, the remedies available to the industry have not proven helpful. On Monday, the Department of Commerce ruled against the industry's antidumping petitions against East Germany and Israel. The Department did rule that imports from the Soviet Union were undercutting U.S. potash, but the suggested relief was inconsequential. This was due to the inability of the Department to accurately determine the impact of competition from "nonmarket" or controlled economies. Statutory change is required to ensure that relief can be granted against these nonmarket economies when they are subsidizing exports to our market.

URANIUM

I have detailed the decline of the potash and copper industries. A third industry is near collapse in New Mexico—uranium. This was most recently evidenced by the shutdown of the Kerr McGee and Western Nuclear operations in Cibola County. These actions left approximately 500 individuals unemployed, and those communities lost their last vestige of employment in this very difficult industry.

The number of employees in the uranium industry has declined from 7,600 to approximately 200 today. Ironically, the uranium industry closings follow the announcement by the Department of Energy that the uranium industry is in a "viable" condition. As long as the Department maintains that the industry is viable, the industry is precluded from any effective remedies. I find it incredible that the Department has made this determination, and I have requested Secretary Hodel—or his successor—to take whatever measures are necessary to revive the industry.

WHAT CAN BE DONE

It is clear from what is happening that our current system of trade remedies is not working. The effect on our people is tragic. Either an industry is unable to make it through the tedious and expensive process because accurate information cannot be obtained—as with the potash industry—or it is able to prove its case through the existing administrative process only to be dropped due to political considerations—as in the copper industry.

That must change. We must develop an effective, cohesive trade policy that will bring our threatened industries the help comparable to that which the industries of other nations now enjoy. Otherwise, we will see our own industries destroyed, as we have seen to a large extent in the case of the domestic uranium industry.

While the number of New Mexico jobs is declining, there has been an explosion of new jobs created by U.S. businesses in less developed countries, primarily in the Far East and in Latin America. Five weeks ago, I visited several of the "maquiladora" or "twin plants" located in the State of Chihuahua. I visited a factory making vacuum cleaners in Juarez, and I visited the Ford Motor plant in the city of Chihuahua. Since 1969, when this "twin plant" program began, there have been over 108,000 manufacturing jobs created by U.S. businesses in the State of Chihuahua alone. That is more than twice the number of manufacturing jobs we have in the State of New Mexico.

The obvious question exists: Why do we sit by and watch the export of our manufacturing and our mining jobs? I believe we need to remember that the middle class of this country was largely build on these industries. We need to ask whether these trends can continue without doing severe damage to the standard of living of that middle class.

And I also want to point out the obvious impact which the strong dollar is having on our agricultural sector. According to the Bureau of Business and Economic Research at the University of New Mexico, farm income in my home State of New Mexico in 1984 was 33 percent below its level in 1980.

NEEDED: A NATIONAL TRADE STRATEGY

In the modern world, where the well-being of the economy is a legitimate concern of government, we can no longer afford the luxury of internal bickering over ideology. We need to have progressive strategies which are aimed at keeping jobs in America and also aimed at making American business more competitive in the world economy. We need a cooperative effort between American Government, business, and labor. Our export and trade policies need to be reexamined. Support for industrial and agricultural exports must be increased rather than decreased, as the administration apparently intends in its new budget to come to us next week. We must be quicker to defend U.S. industry from unfair practices by foreign governments and we must be willing to fight to open foreign markets to accept U.S. products on the same basis that the U.S. market accepts foreign goods.

We no longer have the luxury of ignoring our trade relations with the rest of the world. We must learn that a system of free trade, which we all want, can only survive if it is also a system of fair trade.

These steps are going to require a reorientation and cohesion in our trade strategies. But they must be taken.

As I said, I am pleased to be a member of the Democratic Conference Working Group on Trade Policy, and I hope that through that group we can come up with some proposals which this body can consider to deal with these very difficult questions.

We remain the largest economy by far and still the richest and most successful. We have done more for more people than any society in history. We invented individual opportunity—we have housed, educated, employed, cared for, and enriched more people than ever before, and we have been generous to all with our prosperity in both peace and conflict.

But we have not been able to do all of this by being complacent. We have constantly faced new challenges and met those challenges with practical solutions.

Practical solutions are what we need today to deal with this trade crisis that is facing our country.

Mr. President, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on this important subject and I hope that this year in the Senate we can take some meaningful action to address it.

Thank you very much.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR LEVIN

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUMPHREY). Under the previous order, the Senator from Michigan is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

A GROWING CRISIS IN INTERNATIONAL TRADE

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, this country is faced with a growing crisis in international trade, which threatens the jobs of millions of Americans. In 1981, our trade deficit was $28 billion. By 1983, it had grown to $61 billion. Now the deficit exceeds $120 billion. What does that mean to Americans? For every $1 billion of the trade deficit, an estimated 25,000 jobs are lost. Therefore, the 1984 deficit has cost us in the range of 3 million jobs, and an all too high proportion of them come from my constituents in Michigan.

Unless we take action, this threat to our economy from the trade deficit will continue and intensify. As imports take an increasing share of the market for specific products, the continued American production of these goods becomes jeopardized. When we are in the midst of seeing the grip of OPEC weakened further with respect to our energy supply, we must not stand idly by as new bonds are wrapped around the American consumer and the American economy for a whole new range of products and materials. At the same time, if we continue to allow our exports to be discriminated against, then we will be unable to improve our current position and make the strides necessary to compete effectively. We cannot afford to let American products become the afterthoughts of purchasing decisions made abroad.

It is essential that we address the causes of the trade deficit if we are to avoid these unacceptable results. In doing this, we have to look to three areas: Removing discriminatory trade barriers to our exports; achieving a more realistic valuation of the dollar; and improving our productivity and competitiveness.

As a nation, we have the goal of free trade and open markets for goods and services. We recognize that there are considerable benefits that flow from free trade. Consumers in all nations can enjoy a greater quality and quantity of goods and services in a truly free trade environment.

But free trade is a myth at the present time, and common sense requires that we reconcile ourselves to that reality. Does it make common sense to allow Brazil to subsidize its iron ore industry, and, at the same time, for us to allow it unrestricted access to our market? Does it make common sense to allow Japan to severely restrict its purchase of many of our products, including rice, beef, and citrus when, at the same time, we refuse to reciprocate and impose mandatory quotas on Japanese autos? Does it make common sense for us to allow our products to be kept literally and figuratively on the docks of foreign countries due to arbitrary nontariff barriers at the same time that we have a comparatively open door in terms of testing and product requirements? Legislation which the Congress passed last year to allow for reciprocal actions on our part is a small step in the right direction. But there must be the will necessary to utilize this new authority and the wisdom necessary to recognize that other strong measures are yet essential to assure a fair balance of trade.

In addition to challenging unfair trade barriers and seeking to exert leverage for their removal, we must also take action which will lead to a more realistic value for the dollar. In a sense, meeting this objective is easier because the solution lies more in our own hands. But in an all too real sense, the solution is more difficult because it calls for substantial deficit reduction. It will be impossible for this deficit reduction to be painless but it is essential that it be fair and in the spirit of shared sacrifice. As long as our deficit remains out of control, interest rates—particularly long-term interest rates—will remain too high when compared with the rate of inflation. These high real interest rates encourage investments from abroad, which creates a demand for the dollar, and, consequently, drives up its value. Unless the dollar is more realistically valued, our exports abroad will remain overpriced and foreign imports will continue to enjoy a price advantage as compared with American-made products. In either case, our trade balance worsens and individuals lose their skilled and well-paid industrial jobs and are forced into poorly paid service jobs, if they find any job at all.

Finally, if we are to achieve a lasting solution to our balance-of-trade problems, then we must move beyond rectifying the evils of discriminatory trade barriers; we must move beyond reestablishing the value of the dollar. It is time for us as a nation to take a critical view of our industrial vitality—our ability to generate high quality, well-paying jobs for future generations. We are at the beginning of a technological revolution that will be as profound as the earlier agricultural and industrial revolutions. A broad range of skills will be required for these new industries and for old industries competing in this new environment. How America will measure up to these dramatic and rapid changes depends to a large extent on what we do now to develop the appropriate structures and policies to make Government a facilitator of economic growth and progress.

We must take initiatives such as developing long-range voluntary strategies for U.S. industrial development and growth. We must assure a competent, skilled, responsive labor force ready to adapt to technological advancements and manufacturing shifts. Further, we must provide support and encouragement for the technological advancements so necessary for a competitive industrial capacity for today's and tomorrow's world. In addition, we must seek out opportunities to provide meaningful assistance to State economic development efforts, which, in turn, can blend local expertise with local resources.

In this new economic environment, American business and labor can no longer afford to "go at it" with each other while our international competitors are working together. Similarily the Government can no longer treat businesses as an adversary when so many of our businesses are already taking a beating from competition abroad. We have to work together—business, labor, Government, and the public—to develop a tough, lean, competitive America.

One approach to facilitating this new alliance in the American economy is to establish a Council on Economic Competitiveness and Cooperation. This body, which would be composed of representatives of business, labor, Government, and the public, would provide a forum within which the Nation's industrial strategy can be debated and formulated—where advisory working groups can analyze and develop responses to problems that affect individual industries and geographic regions. Most importantly, the Council would work to achieve a voluntary consensus around an equitable sharing of burdens, risks, and opportunities.

These, then, are choices which confront us regarding international trade. We can choose to tolerate discriminatory trade barriers. We can choose to ignore the deficit and its effect on the dollar. We can choose to be complacent about the adversarial tensions in our economy. But these are choices which we would make only at our great peril. I am confident that these are not the choices that my constituents in Michigan would want to make. I am confident that these are choices that we as a nation cannot afford to make. That is why we must choose, instead, a path of activism which has as its goals the removal of discriminatory trade barriers to our exports, a more competitive dollar through deficit reduction, and a new partnership in our economy for productivity, competitiveness, and growth.

I thank my friend the Chair and I yield the floor.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR LAUTENBERG

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from New Jersey is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

TRADE POLICY/INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, this is a critical period in the economic history of this country. A new world economic system is emerging and our position in it is increasingly in question. The revolution in telecommunications and other high technologies is transforming old economic relationships. And it has intensified an already fierce struggle for jobs, markets, profits, and economic power. Let there be no mistake. The United States faces the most serious challenge to its long-term national economic interests since the Great Depression.

That is the real significance of the continuing decline in our international trade position. In 1980, we had a merchandise trade deficit of $25.5 billion. In 4 short years, that deficit has risen fivefold to a record high of $123.3 billion. Every billion dollars of that deficit, Mr. President, represents the immediate loss of at least 25,000 American jobs.

No one knows what the long-term impact will be. But it is clear that our companies are losing market share, perhaps permanently. Yet we drift along with no real policy for dealing with the problem. And the hemorrhage continues.

We are also about to become a debtor nation for the first time since World War I. In the last 4 years, we have liquidated our net investment position abroad. Mr. President, it took the better part of this century to build up that position. Earnings on our foreign assets have been a pillar of our international strength. Until recently, they were more than sufficient to offset deficits in our merchandise trade. We were creditor to the world. But no more. Now the United States is a net importer of capital. Sometime this year, in fact, we will join Mexico, Brazil, Argentina, and other nations of the Third World as net international debtors. And no improvement is in sight.

This is a grim situation, Mr. President. The causes are complicated. But in the end it comes down to a combination of bad policy, good intentions, and a failure of will. There is no easy solution and the problem will not simply go away. It will not take care of itself. We have to have a strategy for restoring American competitiveness and insuring open access to foreign markets.

One glaring example of unequal market access is in telecommunications, an industry key to an information age economy, and one critical to the economy of my State. The divestiture of AT&T and ongoing deregulation in the United States has opened our markets to unprecedented market entry. Meanwhile, American firms face a variety of barriers in Europe, Japan, and the developing world. The proof is in the trade numbers for the telecommunications. From a trade surplus in 1982 of $200 million, the United States ran an estimated trade deficit in 1984 of $1.03 billion.

Mr. President, telecommunications is not an industry in need of protection. Telecommunications is an industry in need of equal access. It is an industry where the United States is a technological leader. Yet, it faces increased competition at home from firms that launch forays from the shelter of their own protected markets.

That is unacceptable. I joined last year in a bipartisan effort with my colleague from Missouri, Senator DANFORTH, to press for legislation to open telecommunications markets abroad. I am hopeful that we will continue to make progress in this area. Much is at stake.

Now, Mr. President, trade policy is part and parcel of general economic policy. You cannot deal with one without affecting the other. One of the first steps we can take to improve our trade performance is to put our own fiscal house in order. As long as we have $200 billion deficits we can expect high interest rates and an overpriced dollar. The result is an unfair subsidy to imports and an excise tax on American exports. We cannot put $200 billion deficits on the back of American industry and expect to win in international competition.

We also have to learn to exploit and protect our real strengths. The United States has for most of its history been a world leader in scientific and technological development. These are critical resources in today's global economic competition. We are entering a new era, Mr. President—one unlike any other that has gone before. National economic destiny is no longer dependent primarily on natural resources. Comparative advantage is more and more a function of technological innovation and adaptability.

This is why, in my view, intellectual property protection has to be a central objective of any effective trade strategy. The theft of American products, ideas, and technologies by foreign nationals has reached epidemic proportions. Unless we move firmly to assure an effective regime for their protection, our economic future is at serious risk.

Last year, I introduced the Intellectual Property Rights Protection and Fair Trade Act of 1983. The legislation required the President to carry out a comprehensive assessment of the problem and submit a report to Congress detailing his findings, recommendations, and plans; denied eligibility for the Generalized System of Preferences to countries that failed to provide adequate protection for intellectual property; and authorized the use of economic and technical assistance to assist the development of intellectual property rights protection in less developed countries.

This legislation was incorporated in part in the Trade and Tariff Act of 1984. The Office of the U.S. Trade Representative is preparing to implement those provisions. But much remains to be done.

Today, I am introducing, with several of my colleagues, legislation to preserve adequate protection of computer software. The United States dominates the world market in software. It is a position the United States has won with innovation, with technological leadership.

But maintaining that leadership depends upon providing adequate intellectual property right protection. America should enjoy the fruits of American innovation. Since 1964, the United States has recognized that software is a work of authorship protected by copyright. It is a view that had been shared by major industrialized nations.

However, there have been disturbing developments in Japan that threaten to undermine that consensus. Japanese industry and the Ministry of International Trade and Industry [MITI] have advocated stripping software of copyright protection and substituting a shorter, lesser form of protection. As the Department of Commerce noted in a recent study, such steps pose the greatest threat to continued American leadership in that industry.

The legislation I am introducing today would invoke authority granted under the Universal Copyright Convention. It would impose a kind of reciprocity in copyright.

The message should be clear. The United States will resist continued threats to undermine an adequate regime of intellectual property right protection. I would welcome the support of my colleagues of this legislation.

Still, Mr. President, it is but one step. The trade deficit is a reflection of a variety of problems, and a variety of challenges. I am honored to have been appointed to the Democratic task force on international trade.

I look forward to working with my colleague from Texas, Senator BENTSEN, and the other members of the task force, to formulate a broad approach to the issue. In an increasingly competitive world marketplace, we cannot affort to sit back or rely on yesterday's answers. Too much is at risk.

Thank you, Mr. President.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR BYRD

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Democratic leader is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the Chair.

THE CHALLENGE OF GLOBAL COMPETITION

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the Washington Post of December 3, 1984, carried an editorial that began, "Of all the symptoms of rising instability in the American economy, none is less noticed in this country than the deficits in foreign transactions. None is more dangerous." The trade deficit—like the Federal budget deficit—is one of those huge numbers bandied about by economists. For many Americans, it has little meaning.

So why should we be concerned when we learn that the United States ended 1984 with a trade deficit that totaled $123 billion? This figure is almost twice the level of last year's deficit and about equal to the trade shortfall during the entire 4 years prior to 1980. But does it make a difference? Does it say anything about the fundamental health of the American economy?

The answer is unequivocally "Yes." The trade deficit is important. When I first came to the Senate in January 1959, only about 5 percent of the Nation's gross national product was the result of exports. By 1983, that number had doubled. America is the world's largest trading nation. According to the Department of State, overseas customers buy 24 percent of our total agricultural production, 25 percent of our construction and mining equipment, and 20 percent of our aircraft production. My own State of West Virginia exports nearly 20 percent of all goods manufactured in the State. The Department of Commerce reports that this is well above the 13.4-percent national average. It makes West Virginia third in the Nation in the percentage of its goods going to export. One out of every seven West Virginia jobs depends upon exports, and there are more than 2,350 firms in West Virginia which depend upon the overseas market. Nationally, the Commerce Department tells us that every $1 billion of the trade deficit means 25,000 American jobs lost or not created.

Trade is of vital importance. American firms no longer compete against the company in the next city or the next State.

Competition is becoming truly global. With improved communications and transportation, we are approaching the point where all commodities and services must stand up against a world price structure. To say America is importing $123 billion more than it exports is another way of saying that we are becoming uncompetitive; that the world's greatest trading nation is losing out in the world market. This translates—very directly—into a loss of jobs and a decline in economic leadership.

Why is this the case? I have addressed my colleagues before about the problem of an unrealistically overvalued dollar. The Federal Reserve Bank of New York described the scope of this problem in a study which concluded that the appreciation of the dollar in 1983 increased the merchandise trade deficit by some $45 billion, lowering the GNP by 1 percent to 1.5 percent, as against the 1980 level.

And there are other problems. While most tariffs have been negotiated down to between 3 and 6 percent by the Tokyo round negotiations, there remains a long list of nontariff barriers. Some trade specialists estimate that these nontariff barriers now cover one-third of world trade. Prior to President Reagan's November 1983 meeting with Japanese Prime Minister Nakasone, I sponsored a successful sense-of-the-Senate amendment calling on him to seek reductions in the many nontariff barriers employed by the Government of Japan to restrict the importation of American-made goods to that market.

These same nontariff barriers limit American opportunities in the European Community and in our fastest growing market, the developing world. Such practices block U.S. goods, services, and investment and insulate other nations from the reality of global competition.

Finally, we must acknowledge that the trade shortfall is due in part to the difficulty American firms have had in adjusting to the rapidly changing terrain of international competition. These difficulties have been compounded greatly by the other problems I have just mentioned.

I have already said that these factors contribute to a loss in jobs and a decline in competitiveness. But it is important that we not underestimate their impact. Perhaps the most insidious result of the trade deficit has been its impact on our national defense. A declining industrial base weakens our readiness, and a loss of competitiveness can mean less capital for research and development. This becomes a vicious circle as the trade deficit increases.

Former U.S. Deputy Trade Representative Alan Wolff described this dangerous state of affairs in an editorial in the October 18, 1984, Washington Post. This experienced trade policy professional noted that, "Lost sales mean lost revenues. For every telephone system, nuclear power station, or conventional electrical generating system that the United States does not supply abroad, U.S. firms have fewer dollars to spend on research and development and, therefore, learn less about ways to improve existing products and create new ones. More insidious still, our industries do not demand as many engineers and scientists, and fewer are trained.

I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Wolff's observations be printed in the RECORD at the close of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I am well acquainted with the dilemma Mr. Wolff described. I have worked with my colleagues to assure that the American steel industry survives the onslaught of subsidized foreign products that penetrated up to one-third of the American market last year. And I have offered legislation to preserve the ferroalloys industry in this country. That industry is among the most modern in the world, and it has an unquestionable lead in research and development of new products and technologies vital to our defense production base. But antimarket pricing and unfair competition have permitted foreign producers to garner 60 percent of the American market in this crucial industry.

I ask unanimous consent that a letter from the Ferroalloys Association, describing the role of those products in national defense, be printed in the RECORD at the close of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See Exhibit 2.)

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, during the past 4 years, I have been disappointed by what seems to be a lack of interest in the trade deficit on the part of the current administration. At times, American trade policy seems adrift—a ship without a rudder. At other times, we have seen interagency scuffles for control of the helm with the same result—U.S. trade policy without direction. The failure to articulate a clear set of objectives and carry them into action is especially hazardous when we consider that we are in competition with some extremely disciplined trading nations.

Democrats have always insisted on an open but fair trading system, tempered with realism about the world marketplace. Mindful of this tradition, I have asked Senator LLOYD BENTSEN, the distinguished ranking member of the International Trade Subcommittee of the Finance Committee, to chair a Democratic conference working group on trade policy. I am confident that Senator BENTSEN and the other members of the task force will take a hard look at the policies that brought us to this unenviable record trade deficit. And I am hopeful that they will offer insights and recommendations that will help the country deal with this unprecedented challenge to our ability to compete.

Faced with a record $123 billion trade deficit, the stakes are too high to permit us the luxury of inaction. We enjoy a comparative advantage in a great many goods and services. But we suffer from a comparative disadvantage in the lack of well-considered, realistic policy direction. I am confident that Senator BENTSEN and the other members of the working group will help fill that void, and contribute to the effort to assure a competitive world-class American economy.

DEFICITS: A DANGER TO THE NATIONAL DEFENSE

(By Alan W. Wolff

Every nation must pay for its defense. England liquidated its overseas assets, the investments of generations, and borrowed heavily to wage war against Nazi Germany. After the war, it chose policies of current consumption rather than savings and investment. It did not earn its way in world trade, and was quickly surpassed by its former adversaries in economic strength and military potential.

America is pursuing policies today not unlike, Britain's after the war. It is doing so not out of necessity but because of a lack of political will. It has embarked on a military buildup without paying for it out of current revenue. Instead, it is borrowing $2 billion a week from foreign countries. High U.S. interest rates, the direct result of not taxing to pay for spending, extract this capital from other countries.

These economic policies damage the nation's security in a number of ways: 1) the nation's manufacturing base is being eroded; 2) America's technological lead is being undermined; 3) by curbing economic growth in Europe and Japan, relations with our allies are being strained; and 4) in the Third World, the cause of democracy is receiving a severe setback.

Imports are capturing an increasing share of the U.S. market. American exports are faring less and less well in the world's markets. Record trade deficits are announced monthly, resulting in millions of American workers' not being employed or trained. There is now a documentable erosion of both basic and emerging industries, which are necessary to the defense of the nation.

Steel-making capacity alone has shrunk 30 percent since January 1981; import dependency in steel has increased to well over 25 percent. Even this level of domestic production is maintained by a patchwork of export restraint agreements.

The telecommunications industry, in which America is the world leader in technology, has witnessed a sharp reversal in its trade position in the past 3½ years, from a surplus of $1 billion to a deficit of $200 million.

And this is only the beginning. The trade gap is predicted to widen sharply unless economic and trade policies are changed.

This disaster is not due to our workers' becoming less energetic, American management's becoming less far-sighted, or American scientists' becoming less innovative. It is due primarily to the overvaluation of the dollar adding to the other problems of international competition.

Every week that goes by under present policies, U.S. firms and workers make and export nearly $3 billion worth of goods less than the foreign goods this country imports. This trade gap causes a loss of invention of new products and new technologies.

Lost sales mean lost revenues. For every telephone system, nuclear power station or conventional electrical generating system that the United States does not supply abroad, U.S. firms have fewer dollars to spend on research and development and, therefore, learn less about ways to improve existing products and create new ones. More insidious still, our industries do not demand as many engineers and scientists, and fewer are trained, all due to an abstraction, an overvaluation of our currency that is pricing U.S. goods out of world markets and making imports unreasonably cheap in our own market.

In the mistaken belief that it will give America lasting strength, vast—borrowed—resources are being spent on defense hardware. But any arsenal of weapons becomes obsolete shockingly fast. To remain strong, the country must have a strong industrial base and the latest technologies, and the ability to create new products and new technologies. Current policies cannot achieve this necessary set of objectives; on the contrary, they are defeating them.

It has long been the objective of U.S. policies to promote the cause of democratic government throughout the world. We could not long survive as a single democracy in a sea of world communism. The strongest resource for our cause is the fact that communism produces want, and a working free market system produces well being.

But America's economic policies are curbing growth in the world's poorest nations. Interest on external debt has risen to extreme levels, and for the first time there is an actual inflow of capital from these poor countries to the United States. What is the sense of stockpiling arms while, at the same time, sowing the seeds of discontent and revolution that make their use ever so much more likely?

What is so tragic is that this damage to our national defense need not occur. There is no absence of the tools needed to restore health to the U.S. trade position, and thus its long-term defense posture, and to increase the numbers of productively employed Americans and friends of America everywhere. The first step is to cut the federal budget deficit.

THE FERROALLOYS ASSOCIATION,
Washington, DC., January 29, 1985.

Senator ROBERT C. BYRD,
Hart Senate Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR BYRD: The attached excerpts from our original submission under Section 232 of the Trade Act of 1962 made to the Commerce Department in 1981 very adequately state the importance of ferroalloys to the national security and the need for domestic ferroalloy capacity to protect the national security. Since the filing of our petition and the subsequent failure of the Administration to take positive actions to retain capacity, the industry has lost irretrievably one-half of its capacity and is on the brink of losing more to the extent that very soon it will be totally unable to respond in any emergency.

There is no question of the importance of ferroalloys to the national security but to be forced to rely on far away off-shore supplies in an emergency opens a window of vulnerability that would greatly weaken our ability to produce needed materiel for defense. The U.S. cannot realistically depend on foreign sources for these essential and critical materials and must have in place sufficient domestic ferroalloy production capacity to insure the national security.

We believe that enactment of S-262 will retain present capacity and insure the national security.

GEORGE A. WATSON.

THE NATIONAL SECURITY REQUIRES A HEALTHY FERROALLOYS INDUSTRY

Whether our country is at war or at peace, the security of the United States demands a strong domestic ferroalloys industry. Ferroalloys are necessary to produce iron, steel, superalloys and aluminum and are of critical and strategic importance to any war effort. It is impossible to manufacture missiles, tanks, aircraft, guns and other forms of modern military hardware without an adequate supply of ferroalloys. Moreover, it would be impossible to sustain the nation's industrial strength without having the ferroalloys needed to produce efficient electrical generators and motors, petroleum refineries, chemical plants, more fuel efficient autos and trucks, machines and machine tools, silicone chemicals and aluminum castings, to name just a few of the vital components of our industrial economy which are dependent on ferroalloys. The need for a healthy U.S. ferroalloys industry would be especially critical during a war, as the military and industrial demand for ferroalloys would expand rapidly at just the time that ferroalloy imports (most of which come from overseas sources) would become least reliable.

But the country's security needs are by no means limited to the event of war. Since ferroalloys are essential to the maintenance and growth of our sophisticated industrial economy, our economic prosperity, and with it our national security, require a strong U.S. ferroalloys industry during peacetime as well as during war. OPEC has taught us the grave security implications of economic dependence upon foreign sources for materials critical to our economy. Unless the nation has substantial and active capacity to process ores into ferroalloys, its industrial economy will be hostage to the sudden supply interruptions and price escalations of foreign producers. Indeed, if the nation is truly to upgrade its industrial strength and its defense capability in the next few years, we must halt and indeed reverse our growing dependence on foreign sources of ferroalloys.

Ferroalloys are processed from chrome, manganese and silicon ores. While the United States has vast supplies of silica (the chemical term for quartz), it does not, for present practical purposes, have either chrome or manganese ore of metallurgical quality. The sources of chrome ore are heavily concentrated in southern Africa and in Communist countries, and those areas are also major sources of manganese.

Yet there is a tremendous difference in security terms between dependence on raw materials and dependence on processed products. Grave as is our reliance on foreign crude oil, the security risk would be much higher if we did not have our own capacity to refine the crude we import. When a nation has a viable refining capacity, it has the assurance of knowing that it can satisfy its needs for the processed product so long as it can obtain the raw material. As was the case in the 1973 oil embargo, raw materials often make their way into the world market even during a crisis—but only to those countries able to process them.

Without the capability to produce ferroalloys, we would become dependent not just on the off-shore mining and shipment of chrome and manganese ores but on the foreign processing of those ores (and of quartz) into ferroalloys as well. In that event, it would not be enough for the United States to find the ores somewhere in the world's markets or even to develop low-grade domestic sources. The nation would have to pay artificially high, possibly exorbitant, prices for the ferroalloys it cannot do without. Furthermore, since ferroalloy processing facilities are more technically advanced than ore mines, they are more susceptible to breakdown during a crisis. That additional dependence on foreign processing capability would thus increase the nation's security risk substantially.

Furthermore, the existence of an American ferroalloys industry is a critical factor in reducing U.S. dependence on a limited number of sources for ore (such as southern Africa and the USSR). It is well established that the quantity of raw material reserves often expends with increased demand. The more ferroalloy producers there are in countries without large reserves of certain ores (such as the U.S.), the more incentive countries with small or potential mineral resources have to become (or remain) significant alternative sources of ore. For example, the fact that a major U.S. ferrochrome producer was in business and needed to buy chrome ore in the 1970s spurred Finland to develop quickly substantial chrome reserves (which that producer then bought) that had not theretofore been considered an important source of chrome ore.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KASTEN). The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HOLLINGS] is recognized.

OUR FAILURE TO COMPETE IN INTERNATIONAL TRADE

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished leader. I commend his remarks to the attention of everyone. He is right on target. He is talking, at the close, with respect to basic industry and with respect to the State of West Virginia and the State of South Carolina.

Now the cancer of failing to compete in international trade is spreading. I go back on the trade issue to the 1950's with respect to my state's textile problem. I appeared before the Tariff Commission as a witness 25 years ago, and I remember Tom Dewey of New York, representing the Japanese Government, chasing me around the hearing room all day long. We lost that case.

So, we went to see President Eisenhower. We walked in, and the President said, "Don't worry. We know how vital textiles and clothing are." Later, the Government formally determined that textiles were second only to steel in their importance to America's national security.

We were told by President Eisenhower at that time: "Do not worry; you will win the case."

We did not. We lost.

Thereupon, I then went to work with our friend, Senator John F. Kennedy, and upon his election we worked and developed the seven-point program for textiles.

I do not want to get off the path right now with respect to the background and experience I have had in this field, but I wish to emphasize that I am looking historically—from hard experience—and now the cancer is spreading to all parts of this land. Not just to South Carolina and West Virginia, but into all States and into all parts of industry, not just steel and textiles, but into agriculture, too.

I walked into the wheatfields of Iowa in pursuit of the Presidency some 2 years ago and found our wheat farmers in Iowa in competition with the French wheat farmers. And the French farmer was receiving a 25-percent subsidy. We were trying for the wheat contract, if you remember, at that time with Egypt but it is difficult competing against a 25-percent subsidy.

Later when I got down into Texas and Arkansas, I found that the rice farmers there were competing against another 25 percent subsidy from Japan on its rice. Soybeans have been similarly impacted. I had built a grain elevator as Governor back 25 years ago, but my growers have found themselves in competition with Brazilian farmers with their 25-percent subsidy.

So the subsidies by Government have spread to agriculture as well as industry.

Go into the General Motors plant in Detroit, and you see a Japanese robot assembling foreign parts. We do not make American cars any more—the transmission, the gear, the clutch, all come from overseas. Just go up into the heartland of America; Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Ohio, and you will find many of the producers have gone offshore and been forced offshore.

I know that Cincinnati Milacron makes a better robot; Geddings and Lewis makes a better robot than any foreign producer. But Japanese subsidies and Japanese financing put that robot there in the automobile factories of Detroit.

I can go right next door to Virginia and in Roanoke find Cabell Brand and his shoe company trying for 5, 6, or 7 years to be licensed in Japan. He can sell that shoe very competitively in downtown Tokyo. Do not try to give him this Chamber of Commerce line that you have to learn to speak Japanese or you have to try harder. He has learned to speak Japanese. He has tried harder. He has taken on the Japanese. But the Japanese refuse to license him.

Mr. President, what really is wrong here is lack of enforcement of our trade laws. We in Congress over 25 years have been passing laws to safeguard against the illegal trade practices used against us. We have a plethora of laws—the various trade acts, the various customs regulations, countervailing duties, antidumping provisions, escape clause provisions, trigger price mechanisms, perial points and so on. But they are not being enforced.

I do not have the time today under the limited time allocated to me to list all the violations and the lack of enforcement of laws passed to stop those violations.

Suffice it to say the executive branch, be it Democratic or Republican, never has understood, never has appreciated, and thereby never has enforced the trade laws which would level the playing field of international trade to give our industry and our agriculture a fair chance to compete. That is all we are looking for.

We are not looking for subsidies, we are not looking for financing, we are not looking for handouts.

I will never forget that that was the first question asked me out in the Iowa fields. We have to educate those particular farmers. They have been sold that bit that somehow if you start safeguarding, say, textiles, other countries will retaliate against America's agriculture.

That is hogwash. They are already retaliating in the highly, highly competitive field of international trade.

It is dynamic. You can produce anything anywhere and with Government subsidies, financing, procurement, full employment, licensing, inspection—I can go down the list of the various practices—the vital or decisive factor in the trade equation becomes the Government itself.

There is no such thing as free enterprise out there. It is Government to Government enterprise.

The trade arena has changed completely, but we poor Congressmen and Senators are being fed this "protectionism, free trade" pap day in and day out by the media.

I commend the one reporter who is in the press gallery today. The rest of them are not here. They will not ever understand it. It is somehow too complicated, and they do not want to write about it.

So we and they are fed this pap. By whom? By the multinationals.

Let's look at the history. The multinationals were instituted by a positive, affirmative action or policy by our own Government.

First, at the end of World War II, we had the Marshall plan and, thereupon, we said to American industry, if you go out and invest, produce, manufacture, set the example in overseas countries, we will give you foreign tax credits and we will give you foreign tax deferrals. Just spread that seed of capitalism, and these other countries will become capitalistic, freedom-loving, democratic societies.

And that worked.

Singapore, Hong Kong, Korea, Japan, Taiwan, all of these disparate governments, are all capitalistic, competitive entities. The plan worked.

Our trouble is that our blue chippers found out they could, No. 1, produce more cheaply overseas because we here as politicians have set a higher standard of living. I will go into that, but the point is they can produce cheaper not having to adhere to our standard of living, which is a fundamental involved in this debate.

And No. 2, they could get protection. Now if I obtain the dollars for the XYZ corporation to invest, produce, and make a profit, I do not palaver and dilly. I move with the competition and get ahead of the curve, as they say. While I would like to stay in Charleston, SC, and produce my gadget, if I can go into Taiwan, or Japan, or Indonesia, or now Mexico and make my profit quicker and greater, I would do it.

And if I can not only make that profit but be protected, sort of guaranteed profit, I would be ill-advised not to follow along, and so this gradually has occurred.

The multinational is a natural, not a sinister thing. They have taken on the nationalities of their host countries. They have become true multinationals.

And then they come back here and try to sell all this free trade, protection pay through the Trilateral Commission and the New York bankers who make most of their profits overseas—look at Chase Manhattan, look at Citicorp. I can give you the list of the blue chips. Many make more of their money outside of the United States than inside. They can be protected from any action that might be taken against them, so long as they can sell that shibboleth, that myth, to these dumb politicians in the Nation's capital about "free trade, free trade, protectionism, protectionism, trade war, trade war."

I remember during the days of Vietnam there was a saying that, "someday they are going to hold a war and nobody is going to show up."

Well, we have one. It is called a trade war and we are not in attendance. Every weapon—subsidies, financing, procurement, licensing—every weapon is being used. While we sit up in the grandstand caterwauling, the game is in the fourth quarter down on the field. We are about to become a colony. We are exporting our foodstuffs, our wheat, our coal from West Virginia, our timber from South Carolina, we are exporting our natural resources and we are importing the finished goods while caterwauling "free trade, free trade, protectionism, protectionism."

And our standard of living now is in question.

You and I, as the public's representatives, exact that standard. We have the minimum wage, unemployment compensation, social security, clean air, clean water, OSHA, a safe place to work, and everything else. That all culminates in what you might call the standard of American living.

You can make this shirt for about 18 cents an hour in downtown Shanghai. And they have a billion Chinese ready to do it. There are various wholesalers in America already into the Shanghai market. This shirt was not manufactured there, but a lot of them are.

Question: Should we reduce America's standard of living to 18 cents an hour? Obviously not.

So we join issue not just with the People's Republic, but with Mexico at 85 cents an hour, or other particular countries that do not have these requirements. We have to be able to set a policy to protect that standard of living and, as the distinguished leader has so well emphasized, our capacity to continue as a world power. You cannot be a world power unless you can produce steel and glass and rubber, textiles, automobiles, rolling stock. You cannot deliver your wheat on optic fibers—you hear high tech, high tech, winners and losers, service economy, and all of that babble.

They told that to England at the end of World War II. England was withdrawing from the colonies, and some said,

> Don't worry. You are going to be a nation of brains rather than brawn. Instead of producing products, you are going to provide services. Instead of creating wealth, you are going to handle it. You are going to be a financial center.

I was there last month. They are going to economic hell in a handbasket. You do not invest in England. They have the lords and ladies class of society and the poor workers class on the other side striking and nothing is being produced. We can become like England, we can become a second-rate power if we want to continue on our present route. We can become a colony, or we can face this competition realistically and get off of this shibboleth about protectionism.

Over in the rotunda here the week before last, the President said, "I hereby pledge to preserve, protect, and defend." I do not know why protection has gotten such a pejorative meaning in this Chamber, just a few yards down the hall.

We have the Army to protect us from enemies without, the FBI to protect us from enemies within, unemployment compensation to protect us from the loss of a job, Social Security to protect us from the ravages of old age, and laws to protect the water we drink, and the air we breathe. You can go right on down that list. The fundamental of government itself and particularly the Federal Government is to protect our standard of living in a sensible and competitive way. And the most competitive worker in the world, be it on the farm or in the factories, is the U.S. farmer or the U.S. industrial worker.

I am constantly reading this babble—it comes out of that crowd—that somehow we have to get competitive, we have to get more productive. The U.S. Department of Labor, the chamber of commerce, the U.S. Department of Commerce, all agree that the most competitive worker, the most productive worker, is the U.S. worker. And certainly we know about America's agriculture, which is the most productive operation in the entire world.

I ask unanimous consent that the Bureau of Labor statistics be inserted at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. HOLLINGS. But, unfortunately, we have gone out and put a 25-percent penalty on everything produced with these high budget deficits. Anything produced in an American factory has a 25-percent tax on it. We live in an international economy and we are putting a 25-percent penalty on our farmers and our factory workers. And then some have the gall to tell them to be more productive, more competitive.

Some say we need a retraining act. I want to join in this debate about retraining America. That is also babble.

My low per capita income State of South Carolina can provide the best of technical arts, highest of skills and high tech, too. And we will give you anything you want, training anybody in 100 days to do anything and we will pay to do it.

So we do not have any problem about retraining America. What we need to do is retrain this Congress and retrain this Senate and retrain this Executive.

The people of America are producing and competing. This Government in Washington is not producing and competing. That is why I put in a bill the other day to establish a trade council on the Executive level to get enforcement.

Our distinguished colleague from Florida has some time. I thank the minority leader for this opportunity to say a few words. We will get into this debate later on. We want to discuss the history of Smoot-Hawley so we can clear up that record. We have got to reeducate America. The Yankee trader was the greatest of all. There is nothing wrong with America's industry. To say: "They have gotten fat and lethargic" is nonsense. They are lean and hungry. The worker is productive.

I am not anti-Japanese. I am anti-us. Anti this Government right here in Washington. I am angry with us. We have Japanese industries in South Carolina. We have Sony in Columbia and others. In our South Carolina plants, we are producing, not singing company songs. I can tell you here right now that we are outproducing the Japanese at this moment. What is not producing is the Government itself.

I thank the distinguished minority leader. I yield the floor.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR CHILES

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida is recognized.

TRADE AND THE AMERICAN ECONOMY

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I am glad to have the chance to join this discussion on our situation in world trade.

It comes at the perfect time, just a few days before the President sends Congress his new budget.

We have got ourselves in a strange position in this country. It looks like we are growing. We seem to be prosperous. We sound confident.

But the fact is, we are in hock up to our eyeballs.

I know the gross national product grew at nearly 7 percent last year, and it would be foolish to look a gift horse in the mouth. But you would not want to turn your back on that horse just now because you might get a good, swift kick.

Our economic recovery has been very expensive. For this fiscal year alone, we owe each other over $200 billion. But even that huge amount has not been enough to pay our bills.

Last year, the United States borrowed well over $100 billion from other nations. And with the size of our domestic deficits, it looks like we could be putting the tap on other nations for around $150 billion every year until the end of the decade.

I ask you: What is all that money doing for us? It seems to me it is just putting off the day of reckoning. The only way we have been able to manage our own $200 billion deficits is with a lot of help from our international friends. But all that borrowed money is not doing us any good. Not us. And not our friends.

For one thing, our deficits and high interest rates have produced a muscle-bound dollar. On the positive side, Americans can get themselves a pretty good bargain these days on foreign products.

Because the dollar is so high, good foreign wine is less expensive. Good shoes from overseas are not as expensive as they used to be. Foreign cars sell pretty well.

On the other hand, American wines cost a lot more in Europe. American fashions are not easy to afford overseas. And I would be surprised if we are selling as many Buicks in Tokyo as we are buying Toyotas in Los Angeles.

Well, come to think of it, there is really no surprise at all. In 1982, Japan sold 530,000 Toyotas in the United States. The same year, Japan bought 772 Buicks.

In 1982, while Japan was selling 1.8 million cars in the United States, we were selling exactly 3,562 American cars in Japan, according to Automotive News.

And there was one very special person in 1982 who became the owner of the only American Motors car sold that year to the Japanese.

Now, I understand the huge gap in sales is the result of a lot of factors. But it does underline the fact this country should be doing much more in an attempt to open up foreign markets to the goods we make at home.

All of us know about our record trade deficit. We know it is costing us jobs in the short run, and shrinking the American job market for the long run. Deficits have run up the dollar, and made our exports too expensive to buy. So we have to bring down our domestic deficits, and we better do it soon.

The next few weeks will tell us how far we are willing to go to achieve some real deficit reduction. But no matter what we do, we cannot rely on deficit cuts alone to cure our trade problems.

We have to ask ourselves if maybe—just maybe—we have not been overly generous in granting concessions and accepting foreign restrictions.

I think we have been too complacent. The United States just cannot go on playing Anne Landers and letting the rest of the world cry on our shoulders when it comes to foreign trade. Even Anne Landers can spot a bad deal when she sees one. We have to be more forceful in standing up for our own interests.

Now, I am not talking about any trade war. That term seems to come up every time the United States starts talking about getting more active in world markets. What we have to make our trading partners understand is that we are not interested in getting even. But we are ready to get moving.

So let us start by realizing something very basic. We have become a debtor nation. The United States—this great economic machine that rescued so many countries after World War II—is now in debt to the rest of the world.

And if present trends continue, the United States will have an external debt of $1 trillion by the beginning of the 1990's.

If that tells us nothing else, it should at least tell us we have squandered an advantage. We have not been sharp enough in competing for world markets. And we have been too lenient in giving more than we get.

I was pleased to hear Bill Brock say just last week the United States was ready to encourage other nations to lower their trade barriers. It is about time. In fact, I will believe it when I see it. But I mean to tell you I will do all I can to stiffen our approach to the problem.

Three years ago, France told Japan that they had had enough of the nontariff barriers to trade. When the Japanese remained inscrutable, France said, OK, we will start importing all Japanese video recorders through a single French town. Japanese video recorder sales to France dropped almost at once. But so did some of those trade barriers.

The United States has also shown some muscle in the past. Not long ago, we subsidized the sale of 1 million tons of wheat to Egypt. It is true we displaced some French exports in the process. But our purpose was to let the Europeans know we would no longer accept their export advantages derived from their heavy agricultural subsidies.

There are strong indications that the administration this year will move to reduce our own subsidy levels in agriculture. And if that happens, the United States should be more willing than ever to compete for overseas markets with the gloves off.

We have to be tougher.

In Florida, we have a machine tool company. It is an efficient operation in Fort Lauderdale. They ran into tough competition from the heavily-subsidized machine tool industry of Japan. That Florida company tried hard to get the administration to invoke some import curbs on the Japanese. They would not. And today, Houdaille may be faced with layoffs or worse unless they can find a way to work with other Japanese manufacturers.

It seems to me that is exactly the kind of situation in which the United States ought to demonstrate its intent to stand up for itself in world markets.

Now I am all for starting up a new round of trade talks. But we better be ready to make sure the other side listens. We have to convince them Americans are just as willing to look out for the interest of American workers as, say, the Japanese are ready to take care of the workers of Japan.

Nobody wants to return to the tariff wars of the 1920's. In the process of penalizing other nations, we shot ourselves in the foot. We know better than to swing to extremes now.

But in the years ahead, we have to be guided by some basic facts.

First, we cannot sit back and hope that other nations will do what is best for America. While we've got to keep improving our domestic management practices to restore our competitive edge, we must also defend ourselves against unfair trade practices.

Second, we have to shake the idea that when a foreign nation uses every trick in the book to improve its trade levels, that is OK—that is competition. But when the United States reacts, that is protectionism.

That is nonsense. What we are really talking about is American export promotion. that is the name of the game worldwide, and we have just as much right to play as anyone else.

Third, it is not a trade war we want. But let us not be shy about waging war to reduce tariff barriers. What we need to do is let the rest of the world know we are going to be tough on the competition. We are not going to slam the door on foreign trade. But we are determined to open the windows, and remind our friends those windows open out as well as in.

And finally, we have to curb our appetite for borrowed money, both at home and from overseas. Our need for borrowed money from abroad has increased the value of the dollar by 75 percent since the middle of 1980. Even after allowing for differences in inflation, the real value of the dollar has grown 50 percent over the same period. And that is a crucial factor in our ability to compete in world markets.

The overvalued dollar has us at a disadvantage in world trade. Imports have grown twice as fast as they have during other recoveries. The trade deficit is undermining the competitive ability of our industries. And, because so much of our spending is heading overseas, over half of the purchasing power from the Federal budget deficit is leaking out to foreign nations.

That means we are helping create jobs abroad, while shrinking the job market at home. If you doubt it, let me remind you that manufactured imports have nearly doubled as a share of GNP over the last few years. That spells deindustrialization.

It seems to me it is time to cut our deficits at home. And it is time to compete abroad. The world wants us to bring down our deficits. The world should not stop us from doing all we can to promote our own exports.

Recent economic news has confirmed the damaging impact that our runaway budget deficits are having on our economy's capital and industrial base.

Last Friday we learned that orders to factories for durable goods—items expected to last 3 or more years—had fallen in December. More ominous is the trend we have seen over the last half of the year in which nondefense durable goods orders have fallen 3.3 percent below their May peak.

Yesterday we learned that in 1984, the United States posted its largest merchandise trade deficit on record—$123 billion. And the major source of this deterioration was in the U.S. manufacturing sector—autos, steel, telecommunications equipment, and electrical machinery. Even in the area in which the United States has its strongest international competitive advantage—the production of capital goods—our trade surplus has been cut in half in just 1 year. The budget deficit is crippling our industries in two ways. First, the high real interest rates discourage investment that is essential to our long-run ability to complete and, second, the overvalued dollar puts our producers at such a competitive disadvantage that they lose markets both overseas and at home.

Just this morning we learned that the leading index of economic indicators had declined by 2 percent in December. And the major sources of this decline were a drop in orders on new plant and equipment and, next in importance, a decline in net business formation.

So in the course of 1 week we have gotten three messages that point to one conclusion. We are living off our accumulated assets, employing workers in old industries and not undertaking the investment which will provide sustainable growth in the future. If our country is to move ahead while setting the groundwork for our long-term prosperity, we must attack our deficit problem.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with Senator BENTSEN and others today to discuss U.S. trade policy and the problems created by the trade deficit—the largest in U.S. history. I would like to discuss one step we can take immediately to help reduce this deficit—passage of the export administration legislation.

One of the tasks left unfinished by the 98th Congress was passage of legislation to extend and amend the Export Administration Act [EAA]. Although the conferees on the EAA legislation struggled for more than 8 months to achieve a compromise—and as a conferee I can attest to the strenuous effort that went into that search—we were unable to find a solution that was acceptable to the Congress, the business community, or the executive branch.

Since the Congress adjourned last October, I believe that circumstances have changed enough to allow for a rapid passage of EAA early in the 99th Congress. The period since adjournment has given all those involved time to reassess their positions and better define their priorities. There is strong support now in the Congress, the business community, and the administration to move EAA legislation on a fast track.

Prompt action is imperative. We have been operating since last summer under the International Economic Emergency Powers Act [IEEPA]. The act is meant to be implemented when we face a national economic emergency, not because we cannot act on legislation. Continuing under IEEPA is poor national policy since the void left by the failure to extend the Export Administration Act leaves open to question enforcement of other statutes. As important, the vacuum created by the absence of EAA legislation translates to tremendous uncertainty for the business community. U.S. companies must know what the final legislation will be and how it will affect them if they are to proceed with their long-range planning. The present state of unpredictability is yet another impediment to U.S. companies trying to compete in a highly competitive international market. Washington should be helping U.S. companies instead of setting up more obstacles.

It is essential to move EAA legislation because we must begin to reduce the morass of export licensing procedures that are swamping U.S. companies. We had a record-smashing trade deficit last year of $125 billion. This trade deficit is inflicting long-term damage on U.S. competitiveness at home and abroad. The EAA legislation is no panacea for the problems that plague our trade account, but it is a step in eliminating licensing redtape. In particular, the EAA legislation provides for improvements in the distribution license process, and for the first time provides the Department of Commerce with the authority to issue comprehensive operating licenses.

There are other provisions in the bill that are aimed at easing the export procedures. Let me cite a specific example which illustrates the difficulties exporters have with an insensitive bureaucracy.

My State of California, I'm proud to say, leads the Nation in the export of manufactured goods, in the sale of high-technology goods and services, and in the export of agricultural products. California is in the forefront of States with an aggressive export policy and was one of the first to recognize the economic necessity of expanding our exports. Yet California exporters must work with a bureaucracy that refuses to acknowledge that California is 3,000 miles and three time zones away from Washington. The Department of Commerce operates under a myopic illusion that the world revolves on Washington's schedule. In order to do business with the Commerce Department—the agency that controls all export licensing—my constituents have to begin their work day at 5 a.m. Since the Commerce Department closes down at 2 p.m. California time, any questions or problems have to be deferred until the next day. Unfortunately, the rest of the world does not stand still and business deals in particular don't wait for Washington. The EAA legislation includes a provision that mandates that the Department of Commerce accommodate communications to its Office of Export Administration throughout the continental United States during the normal business hours of those exporters at least 4 days a week. It is a small action, but it is appalling to me that Congress has to instruct the Commerce Department to undertake such basic steps. It does serve to underscore the need for congressional action. And it is possible to move expeditiously.

One of the major stumbling blocks in the EAA conference last year was the dispute over the role of the Department of Defense in reviewing licenses to free world countries. This impediment has been removed. In January the President issued a directive to the Departments of Defense and Commerce outlining the role for each in the review process and procedures to determine how to resolve disagreements between the two agencies. Last year I supported the Department of Commerce's position to retain the status quo vis-a-vis the Defense Department and do not agree with all of the directive, but the step has been taken. Now we must give the Defense Department a chance to demonstrate that it can effectively fulfill the role. And now there is no need to provide statutory authority for DOD in the EAA legislation.

Another controversial provision contained in last year's bill related to U.S. policy toward South Africa. I supported title III of the House bill which contained the South African provisions because the United States must make clear in the strongest terms its abhorrence of the system of apartheid. The EAA legislation was one of the few vehicles in the last Congress that House and Senate Members could use to voice effectively their concern about United States-South Africa relations. In the intervening months since adjournment the situation in the Congress, in the country, and in South Africa has changed. I believe that it is now appropriate to consider legislation pertaining to South Africa separately from the EAA legislation, and I support such an approach.

Mr. President, for the reasons I have enumerated, we cannot afford further delays on the EAA legislation. I, therefore, urge my colleagues to support a fast track approach to extend and amend EAA. And I will continue to work actively with my colleagues on the Banking Committee to achieve this goal.

THE TRADE DEFICIT

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, this morning, the Commerce Department announced that during 1984, the United States has run a record trade deficit of $123 billion.

This record trade deficit follows the 1983 record trade deficit of $69 billion.

Which followed the record 1982 trade deficit of $36 billion.

These figures, coupled with our recordbreaking budget deficits, make it crystal clear that our economic recovery today is based on borrowed dollars: Dollars borrowed from the future to finance unprecedented budget deficits and dollars borrowed from our accumulated national wealth to finance current consumption of imports.

Our budget deficits have not yet led to crowding out of other credit in the financial markets, not because the laws of supply and demand have been repealed, but because our budget deficits are being financed to an unprecedented degree by foreign money.

Unfortunately, the effects of our recordbreaking trade deficits have not been so benign. Trade deficits have two major effects: On the immediate short-term economic health of the country in terms of jobs and Government spending, and on the long-term health of the country, in terms of national wealth and prosperity.

The first and most pervasive effect of the trade deficit has been upon job growth in our economy.

It is estimated that every billion dollars of trade deficit we run—for every billion dollars' worth of foreign products we buy which are not offset by American products that foreigners buy—25,000 jobs in this country are lost.

With a 1984 trade deficit of $123 billion, that is about 3,075,000 jobs. That is a staggering number of jobs, especially when we recall that the total number of unemployed Americans is less than 9 million.

If those jobs were available to, and filled by, Americans, our unemployment rate would be reduced by a third. That, in turn, would have a dramatic effect on the budget deficit, since employed people pay taxes while the unemployed do not, so Government revenues increase; and employed people do not need Government services that are extended to the unemployed, so Government spending decreases.

The second effect of the trade deficit is a longer term one. Because the trade deficit springs from the fact that we are buying more abroad than we are earning from abroad, we are exporting our Nation's accumulated wealth to pay for our imports.

As a practical matter, what this means is that we are doing today exactly what we have accused developing countries of doing: We are living beyond our means.

We are doing so without any apparent adverse effect—yet—because foreign money is pouring into this country to take advantage of our high interest rates.

Almost exactly 1 year ago, the Chairman of the Federal Reserve, Paul Volcker, warned us what the inevitable consequences will be:

Testifying before the House Banking Committee last February 7, Mr. Volcker said:

> The net investment position of the United States overseas built up gradually over the entire postwar period, will, in the space of only 3 years—1983, 1984 and 1985—be reversed. The richest economy in the world is on the verge of becoming a net debtor.

So long as foreign dollars continue to finance our budget deficit, we can continue to avoid the consequences. But the size of the budget deficit itself—particularly if it is not substantially reduced—has created the danger that even if foreigners remain willing to invest their money here to finance the deficit, our trade deficit will still drain our national wealth.

The effect of being a debtor nation is simple. Domestic resources—wealth generated in this country—must go abroad to pay foreign debt.

In 1981, for example, U.S. investors earned $86 billion on their foreign holdings, while foreigners earned $53 billion on their American holdings. That left Americans $33 billion ahead.

So even though we ran a trade deficit in 1981 which amounted to $28 billion, our national earnings abroad helped offset that trade gap, and our overall international financial condition left us ahead.

But because of the combination of our huge trade deficit, which has virtually quadrupled since 1982, and the unprecedented string of budget deficits, which have not fallen below $100 billion in the last 3 years, we are predicted to have something in the nature of an $80 billion gap in our current account this year.

Briefly speaking, that means that $80 billion of the production of our economy will be sent abroad to pay foreigners for the money we have borrowed and the goods and services we are buying from them.

It is not difficult to see that a continuation of this trend cannot help but weaken our economy over the long term, even if the current domestic economic figures look good. Regardless how much growth we see domestically, if we are forced to ship such huge sums abroad, we are, in effect, shipping our wealth abroad, rather than using it to invest in new competitive enterprises, in more efficient production, and in more jobs in this country.

To enter U.S. capital markets, foreign investors must buy dollars. Competition for dollars has pushed the value of the dollar up sharply in the last 4 years. The value of the dollar has risen by over 40 percent since 1980.

A strong dollar automatically makes the products of American companies less price-competitive overseas. Our exports cost buyers more in foreign markets. Their products cost our consumers less in our own market.

The sheer magnitude of the dollar's strength has played a large role in keeping our rate of inflation low. It has prevented domestic manufacturers from increasing prices, because they have to compete with cheap imports.

And it has undercut our exporters by artificially inflating the cost of their products abroad.

The effect of a 40-percent increase in the value of the dollar is almost precisely the same as if we imposed a tax of 40 percent on all our exports and gave a subsidy of 50 percent to every import. No business can compete in such circumstances.

This situation is unprecedented in world economic history. Never has an economy as fundamentally strong and sound as ours siphoned off so much of the world's capital.

Never has our Nation run deficits of this magnitude consistently both in trade and in the domestic budget.

Obviously, one outcome of the situation—unless it is reversed—is that we will become a net debtor nation. Americans will owe more money to foreigners each year than they owe to us, so each year a portion of whatever wealth we generate will be shipped abroad to pay those debts.

Trade-impacted companies today constitute up to 60 percent of American business. That is the number of firms which now actively compete with companies either based abroad or multinational American companies.

Many of these companies are expanding abroad, rather than at home, as they see the continued uncompetitiveness of goods produced in our Nation. The effect on our economy of that movement is obvious.

Goods produced abroad provide no jobs here. Factories established overseas reduce the degree of modernization here.

The single most effective action we, in Government, can take to help turn that situation around is to bring down the enormous deficits that prop up our interest rates and continue to attract foreign investment.

That action alone will not reverse the trade deficit overnight. Nor will it or could it alter the political considerations that make investment in our Nation more attractive to many foreigners than investment elsewhere.

So we must also adapt our trade policies to the reality of the trading world as it exists today.

Our trade laws and our international trade agreements are premised on the benefits of an open trading system. The benefits of an open trading system remain clear. But the difficulties of achieving such a system in the real world have multiplied.

Our Nation was the dominant producer of manufactured products in the world when the current trading system was set up. So we could afford to tolerate some abuses of the free trade rules by our competitors as we concentrated on lowering tariffs and worked for the elimination of all tariffs.

Through several rounds of trade negotiations, tariffs have in fact been largely eliminated as a major factor in international trade. But in the interval, as we concentrated on removing that kind of barrier, other nations substituted other policies and created nontariff barriers in their place.

Nontariff barriers range from subsidies, to preferential government procurement programs, to special loan rates and the subsidization of market mechanisms—a host of policies designed to protect local industries from competition or develop industries targeted toward particular overseas markets.

The rise of such nontariff barriers has been the most remarkable of the postwar phenomena that have accompanied prosperity.

For instead of these policies being short-term efforts to get infant industries on their feet, in many instances they have become permanent fixtures in the government policies of our trading partners and competitors, domestic policies so deeply integrated into the operations of their own economies that the resistance to eliminating those barriers is tremendous.

A report last year estimated that one-half of all international trade is now affected by nontariff barriers of one kind or another. The General Accounting Office even found that three of our major trading partners—Japan, France, and the United Kingdom—currently subsidize one-third of their exports.

Clearly this is a significant change in the international trading field and it is a change to which our national policy has yet to respond. Neither the domestic laws that seek to protect our domestic producers from unfair competition, nor our efforts to promote our own exports have kept pace with the changing nature of international trade.

In the forthcoming months, Congress must not only work to reduce the budget deficit directly, we must make a serious effort to develop trade laws that reflect the reality of the international trading climate.

That will be a challenge in many ways far harder than the reduction of the budget deficit. But in the long term, our failure or success could have a much greater and more lasting impact on the future of our Nation.

U.S. TRADE DEFICIT

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, it has often been said that the U.S. trade deficit is caused by the U.S. budget deficit. I would like to make two points about that relationship.

First, I wonder if it has occurred to the administration that the relationship works both ways. That is, it is not only true that the U.S. budget deficit is one factor which contributes to the U.S. trade deficit; it is also true that the U.S. trade deficit contributes to the budget deficit. After all, we are told by the Department of Commerce that each billion dollars of exports amounts to 25,000 jobs. Let's assume that we could reduce the trade deficit by only one-half. We would increase exports to half the amount of the 1984 deficit. That would amount to about $70 billion, equivalent to 1¾ million jobs. If we reached a better solution, which is to have our exports equal our current imports we would gain 3.5 million jobs. All those people would pay taxes.

The second point I want to make is that budget balancing is not a total solution to the trade deficit, or even the largest part of such a solution.

I sincerely hope that the Congress is able to come up with a package for reducing Federal spending that will help to balance the budget of the United States. I will support any reasonable effort in this regard.

But let me warn my fellow Senators that this action is not going to make the trade deficit go away.

For one thing, the action is going to be too little, and it is going to be too late. Any action we take now will at best effect the Federal budget for fiscal year 1986. Moreover, such actions frequently take a year or two to have their effect upon the economy, and particularly to have their effect upon the value of our currency. Therefore, even if we are able to cut the Federal budget deficit for fiscal year 1986 by the majority leader's target of around $50 billion, this fact will have almost no impact upon U.S. trade deficits until sometime in 1987 at the earliest. That means we are in for another 2 years of $150 billion trade deficits.

Moreover, budget action will not help dramatically with our trade deficit because our trade deficit has become what economists call structural. A structural economic problem is one that reflects some basic change in our economy. That is exactly what our trade deficit has come to reflect.

As companies learn that this country is neither going to defend its industries nor insist upon fair trading practices or markets for its exports, those companies change their investment plans. They close their U.S. factories and open production facilities abroad. Many Senators in this Chamber have had the unpleasant experience of learning that a business in their State has decided to close a facility there or reduce employment at that facility and make up the difference by opening some project abroad, in Asia, or in Latin America, or in the Middle East, or in Europe. This reflects a structural problem, and even if our dollar eventually goes down, we will be unable, at least for a substantial period of time, to take advantage of that decline in the dollar's value, because we simply will not have the plants in the United States to make products to export. That is a structural problem.

I submit the reason for this problem is that this country no longer pursues the correct trade policy. When this trade program was framed by Cordell Hull 50 years ago, he convinced Congress that the program would be fair and it would be reciprocal. The current policy is neither.

Let me give Senators just one example of how foreign countries cheerfully take away our export markets while subjecting us to a flood of imports. In this case, as in most others, all the trade agreements in the world have not made a bit of difference. These trade-distorting practices go on as if there were no GATT. Indeed, I sometimes wonder whether we are the only Government in the world that has ever opened up the GATT and read the thing.

Now the example I have for Members concerns the country of Mexico. Mexico is not a member of GATT, so we can hardly say that they are disobeying GATT rules. They just make it plain they do not intend to abide by them. Nevertheless, Mexico benefits from the U.S. generalized system of preferences [GSP] and from the policy we have had in effect since 1923 called unconditional most-favored-nation [MFN] treatment, which means that Mexico gets the best treatment we give anybody, including those countries that do not adhere to the GATT.

Mexico happens a few years ago to have discovered a great deal of oil and natural gas, and they are in a position to export that product at whatever price the market will bear. As OPEC has raised its prices, Mexico has taken advantage of that situation by charging U.S. purchasers of petroleum more or less the OPEC price. But recently, Mexico's oil company, which is owned by the Mexican Government, decided that it was not making enough money off of selling petroleum and natural gas. They, therefore, began to move downstream, that is, they began to produce products in which a substantial cost of production was accounted for by the cost of energy.

In the case of ammonia, for example, where natural gas is 70 percent of the cost of production, they arrived at an export price backward. They figured out what price they needed to charge in order to sell ammonia in the United States; then they worked in the cost of transportation and whatever capital equipment they had to buy; and then they put the natural gas in at whatever cost was necessary to come up with a profit on the transaction. The cost of the natural gas was a small percentage of the price at which Mexico sells natural gas to U.S. purchasers, yet those U.S. purchasers have to compete against imported ammonia made from natural gas that is priced at a fraction of what our manufacturers pay for gas.

This pricing is a form of downstream dumping. It amounts to an unregulated unfair trade practice.

The House passed legislation last year to allow U.S. companies to petition for relief from such dumping under the countervailing duty law, but the administration opposed the provision, and it was eventually dropped in the conference.

This action gave Mexico the confidence to stop selling the United States any natural gas at all.

Meanwhile, how does Mexico treat our exports? Well, last week the Mexican Government announced something called an import substitution program. In the January 1985 edition of the information bulletin put out by the Government-owned Mexican petroleum company, PEMEX, it is announced that PEMEX will limit imports of capital equipment for all of its projects to 25 percent of its expenses. It announces rather proudly that in the past Mexican goods used for capital projects in the petroleum production area accounted for only 20 percent of the cost of those projects, but that in one oilfield development started in 1984, Mexican capital goods accounted for 67 percent of the capital costs. They want that number to be 80 percent. Now what country do Senators think is adversely affected by this limitation on imports into Mexico?

Of course, the country adversely affected is the United States, because as a major producer of oil country goods, our exports will be hurt by this new Mexican policy. So we are not only treated to the fact of Mexico subsidizing or dumping downsteam products in the United States, but we are also prevented from exporting oil country goods, such as pumps, and wells, and pipe, into Mexico. They get not just a petroleum industry; not just a downstream chemical industry; but an oil country capital goods industry. That is not fair, and it is not reciprocal.

Now I submit that this kind of practice is going on all over the world, in Brazil, and Indonesia, and Korea, and Japan, and Europe, and Saudi Arabia; everywhere. Countries all over the world, regardless of whether they are members of the GATT, are playing this trade game like a violin. And the United States is the sucker that is dancing to the tune. That is one reason we have a structural problem in trade.

So, in looking at this trade deficit, I urge Senators to look beyond the problem of the budget deficit at the structural issues. What are we doing to our basic economy by allowing such policies to continue?

THE TRADE DEFICIT

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise today to discuss a grave situation which faces this Nation. The topic has, unfortunately, become an all too familiar one during the last 4 years—our Nation's trade deficit.

Yesterday, the Secretary of Commerce announced the final figure for 1984.

In 1984, our merchandise trade deficit was an incredible $123 billion. That is nearly twice the record deficit of only a year earlier; more than four times as large as our trade deficit in 1981.

This is not an abstract figure. It measures the domestic job opportunities lost because demand at home is met by goods from abroad. The International Trade Commission estimates that 25,000 new job opportunities are lost for every $1 billion increase in the trade deficit.

The reasoning is quite straight forward. When demand for foreign goods increases, and demand for domestic manufactures falls correspondingly, U.S. firms scale back their activities. Meanwhile, the increased demand for foreign-produced goods allows for the expansion of foreign firms, thus increasing employment overseas. In this way American job opportunities are lost, and in fact, are exported overseas.

Using the ITC's estimate, because the trade deficit increased $54 billion this past year, approximately 1,350,000 new job opportunities were lost last year. How are we to get them back?

Equally important, but often overlooked, is the fact that our current account deficit will exceed $100 billion. The current account deficit is a broader measure taking into account not only our trade in goods, but also our trade in services and interest and earnings from our investments abroad.

This is truly startling. The merchandise trade balance has been in deficit every year since 1970, except for 1970, 1973, and 1975. However, our trade in services and foreign investment income has shown a surplus in every year since 1970. In most years, this surplus was greater than the merchandise trade deficit so that our current account balance was positive. Now, however, our merchandise trade deficit is so large that it swamps trade in services and foreign investment income.

What does a current account deficit of $100 billion mean? It means that we are borrowing from abroad—on average, about $2 billion every week. It means that this country is increasingly dependent on the willingness of foreigners to hold dollars. It means that our economy is increasingly vulnerable to economic disruptions caused by the decisions of foreign investors.

Some of us still remember the dislocation and suffering that followed from our exteme dependence on imported oil during the 1980's. We are becoming similarly dependent on imported capital. Just as with oil, capital is a basic input throughout the economy. Just as with energy, a relatively few numbers of foreign actors—in the main bankers—can make decisions that could undermine the economy. If foreigners become less willing to hold dollars, interest rates here would rise as the supply of capital fell, slowing or halting much of our basic economic activity. And, just as with oil, foreigners' willingness to continue to hold dollars—to supply our credit market with capital—is not simply an economic decision.

Things have not always been this bad. What then, Mr. President, has changed?

Undoubtedly some of our trading partners subsidize their exports, and generously, but that is not the whole story. Put simply, quite apart from any subsidies they may receive from their own governments, for the past several years foreign industries have been receiving a huge subsidy from our own Government as a result of the overvalued dollar.

Over the past 4 years, the dollar has appreciated about 60 percent against an average of other major currencies. The overvalued dollar makes American goods more expensive in foreign markets, while foreign-produced goods become much cheaper in the American market. We have, in short, priced ourselves out of many world markets.

Mr. President, I think we should be clear that the large Reagan administration budget deficits have contributed significantly to the overvalued dollar and our huge trade deficit.

This is a relationship that we ought to understand. Let me be clear about it. If the Federal Government spends more money than it takes in, the Government must either print money to pay the difference—thereby giving rise to inflationary pressures—or the Government must borrow money. When the Government chooses to borrow large amounts of money, it competes with private business and consumers for available credit.

The credit market responds much as the markets for most merchandise would respond. Given a constant supply—in this case determined by the money supply—an increase in demand—for dollars—leads to an increase in the price of the good. In the case of money, its price is represented by the interest rate.

High interest rates, in turn, make the dollar an attractive investment for foreigners, vis-a-vis investments in other countries. This increases the value of the dollar in the international capital market place. The result? The overvalued dollar makes American goods more expensive in foreign markets, while foreign-produced goods become cheaper in the American market. This leads to an imbalance of trade much like the one that was announced yesterday.

Mr. President, the budget deficit and the trade deficit are both problems that demand timely action. Failure to do so today only magnifies the problem we will have to face tomorrow.

IMPROVING INTERNATIONAL TRADE

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, the greatest single challenge facing the Senate during its coming session is to take the actions necessary to extend the current economic recovery. I do not doubt that this can be done if we have the leadership of the President and if Congress is willing to make some difficult decisions. We will begin to find out in the next few weeks whether Congress is willing to do what is necessary to extend this current period of economic growth and share its benefits among all Americans.

We have just finished a year in which our national economy grew at a real rate of 6.8 percent. This is an accomplishment not seen since 1951. Despite this strong economic growth, inflation, for a third year, remained remarkably low. The 1984 experience of a 4-percent increase in the Consumer Price Index compares very favorably with our experience of 3.9 percent and 3.8 percent in 1982 and 1983. More recently, interest rates have begun to fall, more in line with the low levels of inflation we have been enjoying. Treasury 91-day bill rates have fallen dramatically in the past weeks. There are still things that remain to be done, however.

Most important, we must find a way to spread the benefits of this economy to everyone. Our unemployment rate is still stuck above 7 percent, a totally unacceptable figure. Finding ways of decreasing this rate must be high priority. While we have created about 7 million jobs in the past 4 years, this still compares unfavorably with the 10.5 million created in the 4 years before that.

Another of the economic problems we must meet and overcome was symbolized in a figure reported by the Commerce Department yesterday. The U.S. merchandise trade deficit for all of 1984 reached a record shattering level of $123 billion. The United States has been running trade deficits since the mid-1970's. But in recent years they have grown alarmingly. In 1980 our trade deficit was $25 billion. By 1983 it had grown to $69 billion. And then in 1 year it almost doubled.

This is a matter of the greatest importance to our economic well-being. The United States is the world's greatest trading nation. U.S. two-way trade in goods and services accounts for more than 20 percent of our gross national product. Millions of American jobs are export related. Our economic health is dependent upon fair and open two-way trading with the rest of the world.

Yet, since the third quarter of 1980 our inflation adjusted exports have dropped by $80 billion—equal to about 5 percent of our gross national product. We have lost over 2 million jobs and untold amounts of earnings for American corporations.

One basic cause of the recent increases in the U.S. trade deficit has been high interest rates in the United States. These have attracted foreign capital and strengthened the dollar. The result has been to cheapen imports, which have flowed in in great quantity. It has also made prices of our exports higher, drying up many export markets for U.S. firms. The result is low export levels and high trade deficits.

The strong dollar has had its positive side. It has brought in large amounts of foreign capital—currently estimated to be $100 billion a year or more. These funds have served to finance our recovery and to provide funds to finance our huge national debt. Had we not had these huge inflows of foreign capital, we might not have been able to finance both our national debt and our economic growth from available U.S. capital.

The fact remains, however, that if we wish to continue our economic recovery we must find ways to reduce the level of our trade deficits. Because they pose a serious hazard to an increased standard of living in the future.

Unless there is a sudden change in economic direction, the United States is moving away from its present status as a net lender to the rest of the world. In 1985 it now appears likely that the United States will become a debtor nation. Shortly thereafter we will become the world's largest debtor nation, with a debt that exceeds that of Mexico or Brazil. And by the end of this decade we could well have a net external debt of over $1 trillion. This could make our present world debt crisis look small by comparison.

Does it make any difference to our economic future if we become a debtor nation? Or is it just a bookkeeping technicality? I am afraid it is a very real fact of life that could have serious repercussions throughout our economy. It would mean that we will be paying out money to foreigners on their investments in the United States, rather than receiving funds from them on our investments in other countries. The money that we pay out will not be available for domestic use. The standard of living of future generations will have to be lowered to pay these debts which are being incurred to raise our present day standards. Another equally unpleasant possibility is that there will be pressures on the U.S. economic policy by our foreign debt holders—something that Mexico, Brazil, and others have already experienced. This could have a serious economic consequences as the OPEC price increases of the 1970's

What must we do to assure continuation of our economic growth? There are at least two very important things currently under discussion that I believe Congress should act on with all possible speed.

First, we must act to reduce our budget deficits by reducing Federal spending. A major cause of our high interest rates is the need to finance budget dificits that may run over $200 billion per year. Clearly the strong dollar, which has played a large role in our trade deficit problem, is a result of these high interest rates. Action on deficits is urgent. It is important that the value of the dollar recede slowly. A precipitous plunge could unsettle financial markets, and create problems in financing the national debt, and cause a sudden surge in the cost of living as the relatively inexpensive imports are cut off.

I believe, as I have for some time, that a 1-year budget freeze is the answer. A fair and equitable freeze can be enacted quickly, without the divisiveness of abolishing programs or agencies. It will freeze deficit levels for the next several years, allowing for reasoned consideration of other means to reduce deficits further. And it is not such a drastic action that it might cause the value of the dollar to plunge. Such a freeze would hold fiscal year 1986 budget authority levels for all appropriated programs, defense and nondefense alike, to the previous year's levels. It would freeze all cost-of-living adjustments for 1 year. And it would freeze doctor and hospital fees for Medicare for a year. This will produce spending savings of $35 billion in fiscal year 1986 and freeze deficit at about $160 billion.

Such action on Federal deficits is one positive contribution that the Federal Government must make toward improving our international economic position. I believe that the other important step we can make is to rationalize our tax system. While this will not make an immediate obvious change in our economic condition—like that which would result from deficit reduction—I believe the results could be equally important over the long run.

We have reached the point where the taxes that we forgive for corporations is greater than what they pay. Tax breaks for business corporations will amount to over $75 billion in fiscal year 1985 while corporate taxes will be nearer $65 billion. This is, of course, a serious revenue loss. But at least as important is the evidence of the nonproductive effort by corporations in seeking to get maximum share of that $75 billion in tax breaks. Decisions that should be made on the basis of economics and the market place, are now based upon the Tax Code. These kinds of games result in the misallocation of untold billions of dollars of resources each year. Investment is attracted by tax advantages to places where it would never go if the market were allowed to work its will. If we are going to compete in world markets, we must get off this tax break kick and base our decisions on domestic and international competition on the economic facts of life.

That is why I am supporter of the fair tax, which I am cosponsoring again this year with Senator BRADLEY. It will provide for a greatly reduced corporate tax rate—30 percent instead of the present 46 percent. And it will eliminate many of the tax preferences that skew investment decisions.

This reduced tax rate will stimulate new and greater investment in areas of the economy which need such growth. It will lead U.S. business to operate as the market dictates. I believe this will all make the United States a more effective competitor in world markets, equipping the United States to hold its own in international competition in decades to come. Our present Tax Code has been warped out of shape by special provisions. The most important contribution Government can make to business competition, domestically and internationally, is to get the Tax Code off the back of business and let it operate freely.

There are other things that need to be done to change our international trading position. But today I simply wanted to mention the fundamentals—the things to be done to get our Federal house in order so that the Government no longer interferes with business activity and the effects of the marketplace. I believe that if we do these things—and do them promptly this year—we will reverse the trend toward higher and higher trade deficits and will begin to ease the value of the dollar downward. When we do that, I am convinced that American business can compete with the rest of the world and we can look forward to a bright tomorrow.

THE 1984 TRADE DEFICIT

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, yesterday the Commerce Department confirmed our fears about the Nation's deteriorating trade balance, announcing that the merchandise trade deficit for 1984 was over $123 billion. This is a $54 billion increase over the previous year's record-setting $69 billion deficit. We cannot afford this continuing drain of American jobs and capital.

Using the standard calculation of 25,000 jobs for every billion dollars of merchandise trade, this increase in the merchandise trade deficit cost us well over 1 million jobs in 1984. Some estimates are that the figure is closer to 2 million jobs.

Particularly disturbing is the composition of the deficit. While the merchandise deficit increased 75 percent, the deficit in manufactured goods increased more than 100 percent. Manufactured goods accounted for more than 75 percent of last year's increase. The manufacturing industries, such as autos, steel, and aerospace make up the backbone of our industrial economy, and the workers in these industries are the core of our middle class.

The deficit is taking a critical toll on American industry at the time it is most vulnerable. American industries are losing large chunks of the domestic market to foreign competition. This makes it even harder for the industries to generate the capital needed to invest in modernizing plants, products, and manufacturing processes to improve competitiveness.

More disturbing than the effects of the current trade deficit is the failure of this Nation, and particularly this administration, to develop any kind of strategy to address this situation. It is appropriate that this announcement of this record deficit comes as we are nearing the expiration date for the fourth year of voluntary restraints on Japanese auto imports. Nothing is more indicative of the problem with American trade policy than the current debate on the American auto industry.

The United States is still the only major industrialized nation without an auto policy. Over 50 nations restrict auto imports through content laws, restraint agreements, tariffs, and nontariff barriers. Every major European producer limits Japanese auto imports. Thirty nations have content laws. And in Japan, quotas, tariffs, tax breaks, financial assistance, and R&D aid were essential to the development of the domestic auto industry.

The auto industry is too critical to the Nation's economy for us to neglect it in the name of free trade. The auto industry is the cornerstone of our industrial base. It accounts for 20 percent of manufacturing employment and is strongly linked to many other industries, from steel to textiles, and from hi-tech to mining.

Ironically it is this very lack of a coordinated policy that leads to protectionism. Because of the failure to develop a long-term policy for increasing national competitiveness, our Government is able to act only at the last moment, when an industry is already facing a crisis. This atmosphere inevitably leads to the ad hoc protectionism that addresses a long-term problem with a quick-fix solution.

Our current trade policy on auto imports is made at the whim of our biggest competitor. Under the current restraint agreement Japan was able to sell nearly 2 million cars in the last year, a new record. For the last 3 years they have had one-fifth of the American market. That is almost twice the share they are allowed in other countries.

In spite of this drain on capital, the American carmakers have invested over $50 million over the last 4 years in new plant and equipment. They have modernized their plants, updated their manufacturing processes, and made a better, more fuel-efficient car. The industry is in a much better position than it was at the beginning of the decade but still must invest over $80 billion over the next decade to stay competitive.

According to an article in Automotive News, an unreleased Commerce Department analysis found that the industry is still extremely vulnerable and "could easily slip back into a new round of plant closings, job layoffs and losses should sales turn down again * * * as some forecasters say they might." According to the analysis, the debt-to-equity ratio of the American auto manufacturers is twice the level it was in 1978.

Our failure to develop a coherent policy is even more distressing in light of the ongoing currency and tax inequities between the United States and Japan. The current 25-percent imbalance between our currencies acts as a 25-percent subsidy on Japanese imports sold in this country. That is worth $2,000 on an $8,000 car. Whether it is caused by "manipulation" of the yen, or the overvaluation of the dollar, this is an unacceptable burden on American automakers.

This situation is compounded by the Japanese tax system. Japan uses a commodity tax as a primary source of revenues, but this tax is rebated on exported products. This is not only an incentive to export, but as the only industrialized major nation without any sort of commodity or value-added tax, this system acts as an incentive to export to the United States in particular.

If the restraints on Japanese auto imports are lifted the Japanese will be able to take up to 50 percent, by some estimates, of the American auto market. This will add at least another $10 billion annually to our already record setting trade deficit. It will cost over 1 million jobs and add over $70 billion to the budget deficit over the next 3 years in increased unemployment payments and lost taxes.

Some people have suggested that an agreement is not needed because the Japanese will not, and according to some cannot, flood the American market. If this is so why are they not willing to publicly commit to what they already are willing to do. This issue is too critical to be left to an informal verbal agreement. Japanese auto import restraints must be continued.

Unquestionably part of the cause of last year's trade deficit lies in macroeconomic factors, primarily our ballooning budget deficits. But that is far from the whole problem.

Yesterday's announcement by the Commerce Department is one more warning signal that we must face up to a new situation in the international economy. The extension of voluntary restraints on automobiles is essential. It will give the U.S. auto industry needed time to adjust to increasing foreign competition and we, in the Government, more time to rethink our role in national competitiveness.

THE CRISIS IN INTERNATIONAL TRADE

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I rise today to voice my concern about the latest figures released by the Commerce Department yesterday with respect to the merchandise trade deficit.

The Commerce Department yesterday announced that the merchandise trade balance for 1984 was a record high deficit of $123.3 billion. This represents a 70-percent increase over last year's trade deficit, which was then a record high, and is more than 2½ times the $46 billion deficit just 2 short years ago.

Imports into this country have been exceeding exports at an increasingly alarming rate. While exports in this country grew last year by 8.7 percent, imports grew by 26.4 percent. Thus, imports are growing at an annual rate of more than three times that of exports.

And the trade deficit is expected to worsen in coming years, leading some economists to predict that the rising trade deficit will work to refuel the inflationary spiral which stifled economic growth during the 1970's. One such economist, Raymond T. Dalio, who is president of Bridgewater Associates, an economic consulting firm in Wilton, CT, was quoted in this past Sunday's New York Times business section that he expects the trade deficit to reach $1 trillion by 1990.

The consequences of such large deficits are very grave already; the United States is projected to join the ranks of net debtor nations this year. By the end of 1985, Data Resources, Inc., projects our net investment position to be minus $93.5 billion, implying a shift of $243 billion in just 3 years.

Thus, for the first time in 67 years, the United States will become a debtor nation.

Now, what are the consequences of these massive trade deficits? Well, for one, the Commerce Department has estimated that for each $1 billion in the trade deficit, there is a corresponding loss of some 25,000 American jobs. That means that last year alone, the imbalance between imports and exports in this country resulted in an additional 1.3 million lost jobs.

The year 1984 was disastrous for the domestic footwear industry. Eighty-nine factories closed costing 11 thousand workers their jobs. Third quarter unemployment in the domestic footwear industry was 17 percent, compared to the 7-percent average in the U.S. manufacturing sector.

In the first 11 months of 1984, 725 million pairs of shoes were imported, contributing $5 billion to the trade deficit. That represents an increase of 25 percent in imports for last year. Shoe imports now account for almost 75 percent of footwear sold in the United States.

Lest anyone think that the picture looks any brighter in the future, domestic production in the footwear industry was down 19 percent in the last 5 months of 1984, compared to a drop of 11 percent in the first 7 months.

Earlier this month, another shoe factory closed in McKenzie, TN, costing 300 workers their jobs. Discussing the closing in the local newspaper, the Jackson Sun, McKenzie Mayor Joe Morris spoke graphically of the effects of losing the area's second largest employer.

Summing it all up, the employment situation in McKenzie looks very bleak right now, and things weren't really booming to begin with, the Mayor said. He estimated that the closing could raise the town's unemployment rate to 10 or 12 percent. You figure they have a payroll of about $2.5 or $3 million, then multiply that about three times for every time it changes hands in the economy and you see what kind of impact it will have on our community.

If shoe imports are allowed to continue unchecked, more and more local officials will be echoing Mayor Morris' statistics.

My own State of Tennessee is the fourth most important footwear producing State in the United States. The industry employs about 10,600 workers in over 30 factories and generated in excess of $130 million in payroll dollars last year. We simply must preserve these businesses and these jobs for our citizens.

The footwear industry is the leading employer in 6 counties in Tennessee and is among the top three employers in another 14 counties. It is a significant industry in 29 counties. Twenty-five of these twenty-nine counties have populations under 50,000. Sixteen of them have populations under 25,000.

The textile industry is facing similar pressures. Last year, imports of textiles came to 9.8 billion square yard equivalents. That contributed $16.2 billion to our trade deficit, an increase of 53 percent over 1983. The deficit in textiles contributes 13 percent to the overall trade deficit. Almost 2,000 textile workers have lost their jobs in the last 4 years in Knoxville, TN, alone.

Other sectors of the economy face similar pressure from imports. Tennessee Chemical Co. is planning to close its copper mining operations. That one company makes up about 45 percent of the tax-base of Polk County, TN. The reason for the closing is familiar—imports.

The agricultural economy is another sector of the American economy which is particularly hard hit by the merchandise trade deficit. The unattractiveness of American agricultural products abroad is contributing to a full-blown crisis in the farming country.

Current overvaluation of the U.S. dollar and high real interest rates in this country have further exacerbated the international trade situation. The dollar began the new year on a high note, setting new records against the British, French, and Italian currencies and reaching a 12-year high against the German mark on January 2, according to a Data Resources, Inc. review of the U.S. economy.

The attraction of high rates of return on investments has also contributed to a huge influx of foreign capital into this country, accounting for a 50-percent increase since 1980. This year, according to former Council of Economic Affairs Chairman Martin Feldstein, capital inflow will be enough to offset half of the Government's borrowing.

It is highly unlikely that we can continue to sustain economic recovery unless we work to appreciably reduce the size and growth of annual budget and trade deficits. Yet, the President has shown a reluctance to exercise leadership on these issues. In fact, when looking at the recent budget proposals which will be included in his fiscal year 1986 budget, and when looking at the budgets he has submitted the last couple of years, it seems clear that this administration has surrendered its will on the deficit issue.

We must work toward prudent and responsible solutions to current budget deficit problems. In this way we will begin to address the serious trade deficit problems which are now hitting our agricultural community and which threaten to retard future generations' potential standard of living.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR BOREN

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Oklahoma is recognized.

Mr. BOREN. Thank you, Mr. President.

THE AGRICULTURAL CRISIS

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I rise again today to continue my vigil on the crisis confronting American agriculture. As I have previously indicated, I intend to come to the Chamber and speak each day on this subject until somehow and in some way we gain the attention of the administration, Congress as a whole, and the American people to the grave emergency and the immediate emergency which we are now facing in the agricultural sector.

This year Congress is scheduled to write a new farm bill and the debate over the farm program is important to every citizen in this country, not just to those who live on the farm or make a living or attempt to make a living through agriculture.

Agriculture is in the worst crisis since the Great Depression of the thirties. In some ways conditions are worse.

Yesterday, the Senator from Montana, Senator MELCHER, chaired an informal meeting which scores of agricultural leaders from across the country, religious leaders as well, the Catholic bishop of Iowa, leaders of the Lutheran Church, and others appeared, to use very strong language about the situation that now confronts American agriculture.

One Member of the Senate as well as the Catholic bishop of Iowa used the term "dying" to describe what is happening to rural America.

President Kennedy once wrote a book, "While England Slept." I wonder if someone in future years will write a book looking back on this period of crisis in American agriculture, a crisis that is bound to spill over into the rest of the American economy, and perhaps that future writer will entitle his book "While America Slept."

Our policymakers have been asleep while a crisis gains force and storm clouds continue to gather over our entire economy.

In the past 4 years, the value of equity in agricultural land owned by the farmers of this country has decreased by over $150 billion. Almost one-fourth of the equity in agriculture has been wiped out in 4 years because so many farmers are forced out of business and so much land has, therefore, been put on the market that the market value of argricultural land has decreased by almost 25 percent.

Mr. President, there were reports aired yesterday at the farm crisis meeting which was held that indicated that in several States of the heartland of this country as many as 10 to 15 percent of the farmers in those States are likely to go out of business this year.

I ask you, Mr. President, if land values have fallen 25 percent over the last 4 years, when we have averaged 1 to 2 percent of the farm units going out of business each year, what will happen to land values and what will happen to equities if 10 to 15 percent of the farmers go out of business in a single year?

How soon we forget. We forget what happened in this country in rural America when in the late twenties the value of land in some areas fell so drastically that in less than a year farms were worth less than 10 percent of what they were worth at the beginning of the year.

And have we forgotten, Mr. President, how that rapidly translated into disaster in the towns and cities as well as being a disaster on the farm? Have we forgotten when 90 percent of the equity value in agriculture was wiped out, how quickly bank after bank and financial institution after financial institution in this country collapsed? Have we forgotten the short time it took between the collapse of farm and land values for the collapse of the small businesses on the main streets across America to follow?

How long are we going to wait? The planting season will soon be upon us. The banks across rural America right now are having to make decisions as to whether or not they are going to supply the credit to put those crops into the ground.

Mr. President, if that credit is denied to 10 to 15 percent of the farmers of this country, if they are not allowed to plant, with mortgages already overdue, no one can begin to estimate the ultimate impact of these developments upon the economy of this country as a whole.

There will not be a financial institution even in the largest city of this country that remains untouched and the whole fabric of life in the rural parts of this country is going to be torn into shreds.

We should be acting today on emergency farm credit legislation. We should not wait until tomorrow. We should not wait until next week. We should be acting today. How long will we wait?

How many farms are going to go out of business; how many banks are going to fail; how many small businesses are going to fail; how much of a crisis are we going to create in the financial system of this whole country before we act?

We do not have a year. We do not have 6 months. We have, at best, only a few weeks to enact meaningful legislation to prevent these results.

The agricultural sector of this country and the family farm unit as we know it is dying. It is in need of emergency action.

Just 35 years ago, net farm income for 1 year would have more than paid off total farm debt. This past year the debt was over 16 times as much as annual income. In 1950, net farm income was $19 billion and total farm debt was $12.5 billion. In 1983, net farm income had fallen to $5.4 billion while total farm debt had skyrocketed to $216.3 billion. For the past 5 years, American farmers have had very little case income with which to attempt to service a huge debt. At the same time, the farmer's ability to borrow, as I have said, is declining because so many farms are being forced onto the market. The value of agriculture land has fallen 22 percent in the last 3 years. It is important to note that this percentage decline, of necessity, includes land near urban areas which are being converted from farmland to land for other uses, such as apartments and shopping centers. The inclusion of this land in the estimate, though unavoidable, blankets the fact that in many counties, dependent totally upon agriculture, land values have fallen over 50 percent in the past 2 or 3 years. As land values have fallen, more and more farmers find their equity eroded to unacceptable levels. In the past 5 years, we have seen a 200-percent increase in farm bankruptcies and forced liquidations.

There are many who claim that we are merely getting rid of "inefficient" farmers. I assure you, we got rid of the inefficient farmers years ago. The farmers that are going out of business today are farmers who have been successful for 20 years or more. The farmers that are being forced out of farming today are family farmers, those who get up at 4 o'clock in the morning during calving season, those who work until 2 or 3 o'clock in the morning to get their crops harvested before rain. These are the farmers that are going under today.

And these people are not mere statistics in a record book. They are real human beings who deserve our concern and understanding. There is a tragedy unfolding that should tear at the heartstrings of the American people and would if they but understood it.

One farmer shows up in the statistic books. One more farm liquidated. A number on a page. But I have seen a lot of those real people. And I have listened to what they have had to say. I have confronted in my meetings people who have come up to me and said. "My great grandfather homesteaded that land. My grandfather lived on it. My father made a living and gave us an education through what it earned, and now I am losing it." And losing it through no fault of his own or losing it through no failure to work hard.

The Senator from New Mexico just talked about the trade imbalance. We had testimony before the Finance Committee this week by some of those who are going to be occupying positions of responsibility in the Treasury Department. Overall, they made a good presentation. But, at one point in the testimony, they were asked how they felt about the strong dollar which was contributing to this trade imbalance that has been discussed on the floor this morning. They said, "Well, in some ways, maybe it is a good thing because through that strong dollar we are getting people in other countries to invest in this country and in essence service the national debt, in essence, pay the interest on the national debt for us."

I do not have mixed feelings about the overvaluation of the dollar that is destroying our trade deficit. I do not see anything good about it. When I think about what it is doing to the farmers of this country, driving them more and more in record numbers into bankruptcies, I think to say there is anything good about it is inexcusable.

Recently, one of our grain trading companies, while we have a huge surplus of grain in this country, they talked about importing wheat from Argentina. They claimed they could import the wheat from Argentina, pay the freight on that wheat, pay the 21 cents a bushel tariff on that wheat and still bring it into the Port of Houston at a substantially lower price than the price per bushel of wheat in this country.

Of course, that is true. But why is it true? Is it because our farmers are not productive? Is it because our farmers are not the most efficient producers in the world?

Absolutely not. It is because the value of Argentine currency has fallen 86 percent against the value of the American dollar in the last 12 months. How can any sector in our economy, no matter how efficient it is, compete with those kinds of dislocations in the value of currency compared to the American dollar?

We are going to sit here and dismantle a whole sector of our domestic economy, important not only to the economic health of this Nation but to its moral fiber, as well, if we do not do something about it.

Why has the crisis reached this point? In part, I believe it is because many Americans do not understand the economics of agriculture or the importance of the farm sector to them personally. They do not know that to start an average family farm today requires over $425,000 in capital. The majority of the American people believe that they are subsidizing the farmer. In one sense, the taxpayers have subsidized farmers through programs which have cost far more than they should due to shortsighted farm policies.

In the larger sense, it is the farm sector which is subsidizing the rest of the country. The facts are clear. Agriculture is the most productive and most efficient sector of our Nation's economy. It is consistently one of the few sectors of our economy where we have a favorable trade balance. Last year, we sold to other countries $19 billion more in agricultural products than we purchased. Additionally, our farmers have been giving Americans the greatest food bargain in the world. Americans spend only 16 percent of their income for food. The average Russian spends 45 percent for food. Even in Great Britain the average is about 28 percent. American food consumers get more for their money today than in 1950. In 1950, an hour's wage for the average worker bought 10 pounds of bread or 8 quarts of milk. Today, it will buy 16 pounds of bread or 15 quarts of milk. The American consumer only has to work an average of 18.5 minutes to buy 1 pound of steak today; whereas, in 1950, the same consumer would have had to work 32.8 minutes for the same steak.

In great part, American consumers have received these benefits due to dramatic increases in the productivity of our farmers. At the beginning of this century, one farmworker could only feed seven persons. By 1970, this farmworker supplied enough food and fiber for 47 people. In the past 10 years the productivity of this 1 farmworker has almost doubled—he now supplies enough for 78 people. This increased agricultural productivity, the rise of output per unit of input, has been a major contributor to improved living standards for Americans. As agricultural productivity has increased, consumers have been able to upgrade their diets at a lower cost.

The farmers, however, have been absorbing the cost of providing these benefits to the rest of the Nation, usually selling below their actual cost of production and by going broke in record numbers. When we have record numbers of farmers going bankrupt, our entire economic system is threatened. History has shown that the Great Depression of the thirties was "farm led and farm fed."

What can be done? No one can pretend to have all the answers, but some steps clearly must be taken.

First, and foremost, we must bring down Federal budget deficits which lead to high interest rates for farmers and an overvalued dollar which prevents them from selling in world markets. A balanced Federal budget would be of great economic benefit to our Nation's farmers.

Second, we should develop a long-range, multiyear policy aimed at bringing production in line with demand and announce it early enough so that farmers can make plans. Often programs are changed even after farmers have planted their crops. All of this wastes taxpayers' money and our precious national resources.

Third, in our foreign aid programs, we should send fewer dollars overseas, and make greater use of our surplus farm products.

Fourth, a long-range conservation component is an essential ingredient in any good farm program. We need a program which will allow farmers to take erosion-prone land out of cultivation and place it in conservation treatment for a number of years, while also providing financial incentives to make up for lost income from this land. Such a program would save our precious soil resources and would help the taxpayers by reducing surpluses and by cutting the cost of our commodity programs by hundreds of millions of dollars.

Of course, Mr. President, any consideration of long-range improvements in the farm program will become moot if we do not have emergency action on the credit front to keep the massive bankruptcies and collapse of the agricultural sector, which is looming before us now, from occurring. I wish that I could say to every person in America as loud as I can shout it: Wake up. Wake up before it is too late. It is not just the security and well-being of the farmer which is at stake, it is the security and well-being of every American city and every American household, as well.

The soundness of our financial system is our economic security, which is at stake. Obviously, Mr. President, every American should care about what is happening on the farm. Let us band together now to work for a commonsense farm bill this year and for emergency credit help to the agricultural section.

Mr. LEVIN. I thank my friend from Oklahoma for his tremendous statement. It was well thought out, as always.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, not to extend beyond the hour of 2 p.m., with statements limited therein to 5 minutes each.

Mr. ZORINSKY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GORTON). Without objection, it is so ordered.

VISIT TO THE SENATE BY A MEMBER OF THE SENATE OF FRANCE

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I should like to advise the Senate that we have a distinguished guest: the Honorable Jean-Marie Girault, who is a member of the Senate of France and is mayor of the city of Caen.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, pursuant to the provisions of rule VI of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I ask the leave of the Senate to be absent for the purpose of visiting the Union of the Soviet Socialist Republic at the invitation of the Supreme Soviet for the purpose of discussing with the Soviet officials questions of arms control, human rights, and other matters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHAFEE). Without objection, it is so ordered.

INTERGOVERNMENTAL COOPERATION

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I know that in the next few days many of the State and local elected officials of this Nation will be focusing on the President's budget proposal for 1986 and many will feel compelled to speak out against the program reductions and terminations that the President will recommend. We will have a spirited debate on the budget, I am sure.

But before we get to the budget, I would like to call attention to a little good news in the Federal partnership. There is evidence today that I can bring to the attention of my colleagues here in the Senate and State and local elected officials across the Nation that there is a commitment to consultation and cooperation on the part of the President and high officials in his administration.

In early 1982 the Office of Management and Budget announced that OMB Circular A-95 would be reviewed with the possible intention of abolishing these regulations which had been the focus of a cooperative process between the Federal Government and State and local governments since the Johnson administration. Many of those with long experience in the intergovernmental system expressed concern that the zeal for regulatory reform—read to mean the abolition of existing regulations—would surely mean the demise of A-95 which had become a comfortable and familiar landmark in the American Federal partnership.

I was one who expressed concern and as chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Intergovernmental Relations, I scheduled hearings and directed the resources of the subcommittee to follow the review process closely. I learned that OMB was justified in raising concerns.

Although A-95 was working well in Minnesota where I could see its benefits most directly, in other parts of the Nation it had become just one more part of the redtape jungle imposed on State and local officials who were doing their best to meet the needs of their constituents.

A-95 was not abolished. After a thorough and careful review, President Reagan issued Executive Order 12372 to replace the circular which had been the instrument to implement the Intergovernmental Cooperation Act. I think that the President's order strengthened the foundation of intergovernmental cooperation. I think that the Federal agencies now pay more heed to the views of State and local governments before assisting an activity through grants or entering into a development project directly.

My confidence in Executive Order 12372 has been expressed legislatively. I have referenced the Executive order as the mechanism to assure intergovernmental cooperation in two of the bills I have sponsored in recent months, the State and Local River Conservation Act and legislation to control nonpoint sources of water pollution.

The President's confidence in Executive Order 12372 is made evident by two memoranda that I am about to introduce into the RECORD. The first is a memo to the President from David Stockman entitled "A Federalism Success Story." The second is an attachment to the Stockman memo written by Lee Verstandig, the President's Assistant for Intergovernmental Affairs.

Mr. President, the memos that I have are copies. They went into the President's office and came out with the following handwritten notation in the upper corner, "This is great * * * R.R." On this point I am in wholehearted agreement with the President of the United States and he and the members of his administration who are responsible for the successful implementation of Executive Order 12372 have my sincere congratulations.

So as we enter what will at times seem an acrimonious debate on the budget and its impact on State and local governments, I want my colleagues here in the Senate and my many friends in the State and local community to know that the commitment from the White House to a successful intergovernmental partnership continues and that the desire to work together to meet the needs of all Americans in a cooperative spirit is real.

I ask unanimous consent that the material to which I have referred be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXECUTIVE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
OFFICE OF MANAGEMENT AND BUDGET,
Washington, DC, January 4, 1985.

Memorandum for: The President.
From: David A. Stockman.
Subject: A Federalism Success Story.

When you came into office, the policy governing the way proposed Federal activities were reviewed by and coordinated with State and local governments was directly contrary to your concept of Federalism. The old OMB Circular A-95 system:

Mandated State and local governments to establish certain organizations and processes to review proposed Federal actions.

Established Federal requirements through an administrative circular rather than an Executive order, giving rise to both a confusing welter of varying agency rules and a seeming lack of Federal understanding or adherence to the intergovernmental dialogue Congress intended.

As a result, and at the recommendation of the Vice President's Task Force on Regulatory Relief, you signed Executive Order 12372 on July 14, 1982. The Order, which took effect on October 1, 1983, totally reversed the old system. Under the new system:

States, in consultation with their local governments, can establish systems to review proposed Federal actions according to their own needs and requirements.

Federal agencies are now mandated to be responsive to State and local concerns and to use the States' systems, instead of States responding to Federal requirements.

The attached report briefly describes the way Federal, State, and local governments have implemented the Order, and provides examples that validate OMB's findings that, in general, Federal agencies are complying with your intent:

Most Federal agencies are being more responsive to State and local concerns. For example, the Department of Housing and Urban Development delayed funding of a Urban Development Action Grant at Florida's request; the Corps of Engineers halted expansion of an Army reserve center in Vermont in order to discuss their proposal with State and local officials; and the Air Force changed its plans for a hazardous waste disposal site in Nevada to accommodate local concerns.

The negotiation and cooperation furthered by E.O. 12372 brings about better, more efficient public decisions and avoids costly duplication of services. At Kansas' recommendation, HHS did not fund a potentially duplicative health services project, saving the Federal Government about $100,000. Three small localities in North Carolina coordinated their plans for sewage treatment drawing not only upon Federal funds, but also existing State and county funds, and, as a result, saving Federal, State, and local governments an estimated $1,500,000 in project costs. Governor Thompson used the Order to identify more employment opportunities for Illinois' Job Training Partnership Act trainees.

At the recommendation of the State and local officials we contacted, OMB and the agencies are undertaking various procedural changes that will make the Order work better. OMB will work with the agencies to increase the number of proposed Federal activities State and local officials can review. We will also ensure continued Federal responsiveness to State and local concerns, and continued use of the States' review processes. We will undertake periodic reviews of agency implementation and will ensure that agency officials understand the Order's broader Federalism policies.

In summary, we have found those policies to be sound and our basic approach sufficient. The commitment of policymakers at all levels of government to utilize the Order will guarantee that the intergovernmental partnership you envisioned is a vital one.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, DC, January 11, 1985.

Memorandum for: The President.
From: Lee L. Verstandig.
Subject: Attached Assessment of Executive Order 12372, "Intergovernmental Review of Federal Programs".

The attached report from Dave Stockman assesses the first year's implementation of Executive Order 12372, "Intergovernmental Review of Federal Programs." This consultation policy replaced the old OMB circular A-95 system and took effect on September 30, 1983. The new system pertains to Federal consultation with state and local officials on proposed Federal actions which directly affect their jurisdictions.

Just as block grants have carried your federalism goal of a balanced intergovernmental partnership to program decisions and State/local regulatory decisions, Executive Order 12372 brings this kind of partnership to those day-to-day interactions Federal agencies have with state and local officials. The agencies are now more responsive to state and local concerns, and officials at all levels are communicating with each other more effectively.

In this spirit, I am joining with OMB to underscore your commitment to this element of your Federalism efforts. To that end and with your approval, I plan to transmit copies of this new report to the Cabinet secretaries and agency heads encouraging their continued successful implementation of Executive Order 12372.

JIM THOMAS, AN OUTSTANDING ENTREPRENEUR

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, one of the true strengths of the American economy is the opportunity it provides for individuals who are highly motivated to succeed in a business which they own and control.

Historically, a substantially majority of the growth in jobs in this country has taken place in what we have come to call small business. Given the right kind of training, strong ambition and willingness to work, adequate financial backing, and a little luck, it is refreshing to note that it is still possible to exercise the kind of entrepreneurial spirit which has made this Nation great.

This entrepreneurial spirit is evident in the story of James Thomas who, in just over 5 years, has built up one of the most successful black-owned businesses in Minnesota.

Jim Thomas is a native of south Minneapolis who began his relationship with the automotive industry while working as a management trainee at Ford Motor Co. Like another graduate of the Ford management trainee program—Lee Iacocca—Jim soon found his place in the sales end of the business at a Lincoln-Mercury dealership on the South Side of Chicago. Three years later, General Motors recruited him to start up a new dealership in a rapidly growing suburban area north of Minneapolis.

These past 5 years have not been easy years for auto dealers nationally. According to the Minnesota Auto Dealers Association, Minnesota lost 130 of its 810 dealers between 1979 and 1982. Nationally, in those 3 years, about 4,000 of the country's nearly 29,000 dealerships folded.

But, Jim Thomas' dealership has thrived—growing from $2.5 million in sales in its first year to over $20 million in 1984. Today, Thomas Pontiac Buick GMC, Inc., ranks 57th on the Black Enterprise magazine's annual roster of the top 100 black businesses in the United States.

Jim, at age 36, is already a role model for other minority entrepreneurs in Minnesota and has been active in establishing a mentoring program to pair established high-ranking executives in Minnesota with minority business operators. In 1983, he was named "Entrepreneur of the Year" by the Metropolitan Economic Development Association, a privately funded group which provides management and technical assistance to minority owned businesses.

Because of the outstanding achievements represented in Jim Thomas, I ask unanimous consent that the text of a recent article on him from the St. Paul Pioneer Press and Dispatch be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

1979 GAMBLE PAYS OFF FOR CAR DEALER

AUTO BUSINESS POSTS 1984 SALES OF $20 MILLION

(By Wilma Randle)

James Thomas probably could not have picked a worse time to go into business if he had tried.

It was the fall of 1978 and Thomas was about to realize a dream: opening a car dealership. Given the state of the economy then, it was a dream on which few smart odds-makers would have wagered.

Interest rates were pushing up to all-time highs. Going-out-of-business stickers were replacing grand opening signs on car lots.

But Thomas, who was raised in South Minneapolis, decided to take a chance.

"There was a lot of concern, but my will to survive was strong," he said of the first months of operations.

He won the bet and today, his Coon Rarids dealership is flourishing. Last year, Thomas Pontiac Buick GMC Inc. posted sales of $20 million, up from $2.5 million in its first year. The agency employs 70 workers, up from 16 when it started doing business.

His success has not gone unnoticed. In 1983 the Metropolitan Economic Development Association named him Entrepreneur of the Year. MEDA is a privately funded group that provides management and technical assistance to minority-owned businesses.

His firm ranks 57th on Black Enterprise magazine's latest annual roster of the Top 100 Black Businesses in the United States. Only two other Minnesota companies, Adult Inc., Brooklyn Center, and Superior Ford, Plymouth, have made the list in its 12-year history. (They were not on last year's list.)

Survival is always easier in the telling. Thomas 36, recalls that he and his employees worked long and hard to keep the doors open in the early days. "I knew I could adapt," he said. "What we did to survive was to control expenses. I wore about five different hats—from sales manager to selling cars—whatever it took."

Thomas's sister, LaJune Thomas Lange, said he's always had a talent for an interest in business. "When he was growing up he had his own lawn-mowing service, he was a golf caddy and collected pop bottles," said Lange, who was named earlier this month as a Hennepin County municipal judge by Gov. Rudy Perpich.

"He hired me to iron his shirts."

She explained that she wasn't yet 16, the legal age then for getting a job, and brother James was willing to give her the business.

"At the time the style was cotton, starched shirts, which took a lot of time to do. I charged him 25 cents for shirts and the same for slacks."

MANAGEMENT TRAINEE

Thomas and his sister have always been close. He said she influenced his decision to atttend Augsburg. "It had a good reputation for being a liberal arts college and my sister had graduated from there so I sort of followed in her footsteps."

Like his sister, he majored in psychology. But that's where their paths split. An encounter with a recruiter for Ford's management training program aroused his interest. He was accepted into the program and a childhood liking for cars began evolving into a career.

"I had always been able to identify every car on the road," he said.

Thomas stayed with Ford for five years, starting out handling customer complaints.

"My career with Ford ended up being one long training program. I went through a lot of courses—about 75—everything from marketing to auto technology

When he left Ford, Thomas was convinced he wanted to be in the dealer end of the business.

"TOO SHARP"

Unsuccessful attempts at getting his own dealership led him to Chicago, where he worked for Horace Noble, owner of Noble Lincoln Mercury on the city's South Side. That agency is one of the country's most successful black-owned auto dealerships.

The two had met during Thomas' early days at Ford.

Noble said he tried to help Thomas get a dealership in Cincinnati. "We went there. I tried to back him with my influence and money, but it was said he was too young and too inexperienced."

Then Thomas went to work for Noble in Chicago.

His title was store manager and he did a good job, Noble recalled.

"He was too sharp for my dealership," said Noble. "In fact, when General Motors called me to ask about him I said 'put him in a good middle class area.' He was a little too high quality to work at an inner city dealership."

He left Chicago three years later after GM recruited him to open the Coon Rapids dealership.

"It was a good experience," said Thomas of his Chicago years. "It was a tough market. I believe there are 300 auto dealerships within the city limits and they're open seven days a week. We worked from 8 a.m. to 9 p.m."

General Motors had plans to establish a Coon Rapids dealerships for about a year before Thomas applied for the franchise, said William W. Frickling, GM's manager of dealer development. The company also had determined it wanted a minority operator at the site.

"People were impressed with him, with his experience and knowledge of the business.

"It was the absolute worst time for anybody to start in the business. It was in the middle of the worst recession in the industy's history."

Thomas' success is directly tied to the upturn in the nation's economy and for the auto industry in particular. The rebound was reflected by the Black Enterprise survey, which shows car dealers holding 23 of the 100 spots.

From 1979 when Thomas opened shop until 1982, Minnesota lost about 130 of its 810 dealerships to the poor economy, said Gary Rippentrop, executive vice president of the 625-member Minnesota Automobile Dealers Association. Nationally, from 1979 to 1982, about 4,000 of nearly 29,000 dealerships folded.

The downturn in the auto industry ended in 1983. Minnesota dealer's sales last year ranked with their best in history, according to Rippentrop.

The location of the Thomas agency has helped, too. Metropolitan Council analysts say Coon Rapids is one of the fastest growing municipalities in the state. They predict that population and jobs there will nearly double by the year 2000.

HARD WORK, SERVICE

But there's more to Thomas' success, said Rippentrop.

"I think it's his aggression—and I say that in a positive way. What I see about Jim is that he aggressively works his business, day to day. And the second thing is that he's a counselor. People know that buying a car is a major purchase and they want to be guided, counseled in making that decision. Jim is exellent at this."

Thomas stressed service as a key to his success. His service department is open 18 hours a day, Mondays through Thursdays.

MEDA likes to tell Thomas' story, said Experanza Guerrero, the organization's director of business development. That group helped Thomas develop the loan package for his mortgage.

"We use him as a role model for our smaller clients," she said. "What's impressive about him is that he's a good manager. He understands his strengths and weaknesses and he hires people to complement those things."

She credits Thomas with suggesting that MEDA establish a mentoring program to pair established high-ranking executives with minority business operators.

Started in 1982, the mentoring program has increased to 36 from 12 participants. MEDA hopes the number will top 50 this year.

SENSE OF COMMUNITY

Thomas said he considers himself a community as well as corporate citizen. "I believe that when an employer succeeds it impacts on the community."

He sponsors sports calendars for several schools in his area, provides cars for parades and backs youth sports teams.

Thomas noted that there are only two other black auto dealers in Minnesota, but said being a minority hasn't made that much difference to his business. His dealership, located at 3815 N.W. Coon Rapids Blvd., serves a suburban area where few minorities live.

He added: "Growing up, you didn't even deal with being a minority. It was no big deal. I had friends of all nationalities."

Thomas was born in Kansas City. His family moved to Minneapolis when he was two. His father, James Sr., was a postal carrier. His mother, Myrtle, was a housewife.

"My parents participated in our education," his sister recalled. "It was a time when PTAs were strong and our parents were really involved in school and at home. My father worked with us, drilling us on math and geography outside school."

The younger Thomas said he had no ambitions of being a car dealer. "I never thought about it. There weren't any role models."

His sister said while they share in each other's successes, she's not surprised at how well he's done.

"When my brother's dealership was first opened, some of the people in the industry said to me, 'Your brother's going to a millionaire,' and I didn't have any trouble believing that at all."

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMENDATION OF SENATOR BARRY GOLDWATER FOR EXCEPTIONALLY DISTINGUISHED SERVICE ON SELECT COMMITTEE ON INTELLIGENCE

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I have a resolution at the desk that I now call up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

S. RES. 56

Whereas, Senator Barry Goldwater, with unstinting devotion to the national security of the United States, served on the Select Committee on Intelligence from its inception in April, 1976, until January, 1985;

Whereas, Senator Barry Goldwater, as Vice Chairman of the Committee during the 95th and 96th Congresses and with his belief that our country's intelligence efforts were beyond normal politics, worked in the best traditions of bipartisanship with Chairman Daniel K. Inouye and Chairman Birch Bayh;

Whereas, Senator Barry Goldwater set a standard for diligence, dedication, bipartisanship, and fairness during his leadership of the Committee as its Chairman during the 97th and 98th Congresses;

Whereas, Senator Barry Goldwater recognized that intelligence is the first line of national defense and that good intelligence is vital in meeting the challenges of a complex and dangerous world;

Whereas, his unique background, knowledge, and experience as a soldier, pilot, photographer, communicator, author and world traveler proved invaluable in providing the Committee with wisdom and perspective in dealing with complicated intelligence oversight issues;

Whereas, this distinguished legislator played a vital role in securing the enactment of a series of Intelligence Community budget authorizations that were essential to the enhancement of the intelligence capabilities of the United States;

Whereas, Senator Barry Goldwater provided leadership and support crucial to the enactment of legislation to protect the identities of undercover intelligence officers and intelligence agents and legislation to safeguard the operational files of the Central Intelligence Agency from unwarranted search and review;

Whereas, Senator Barry Goldwater's unrelenting devotion to principle, his courage, his honesty, and his abiding patriotism led him to voice constructive criticism in the interest of improved intelligence;

Whereas, Senator Barry Goldwater's stewardship of the Select Committee on Intelligence has conclusively demonstrated that congressional oversight of our nation's intelligence activities can be both tough and fair, both responsible and supportive, and both rigorous and secure; and

Whereas, Senator Barry Goldwater for over eight years discharged his responsibilities on the Select Committee on Intelligence with unfaltering adherence to the highest standards of the Senate and the country; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the United States Senate express and record its deep appreciation for Senator Barry Goldwater's exceptionally distinguished service to the Select Committee on Intelligence, to the Senate, and to the people of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I rise to salute one of the great institutions of the Senate, Senator BARRY GOLDWATER of Arizona. The public has heard of many of his exploits, but we are also grateful to him for his fine work on the Select Committee on Intelligence. The resolution before us is a modest effort to call attention to one more area in which Senator GOLDWATER has done great services for his country.

As BARRY GOLDWATER leaves our committee, he leaves behind an unsurpassed record of Intelligence Committee leadership. He served for 4 years as vice chairman, and then another 4 years as chairman—the longest that any human being has survived in that position.

Senator GOLDWATER has often said that he opposed the very creation of the Select Committee on Intelligence, and I suppose that is true. But you would not know it from watching him.

Senator GOLDWATER has always understood why the Intelligence Committee was created and what it had to do. He himself has said that it was the failure of the Senate to exercise effective oversight over intelligence activities that led to the Church committee and the creation of a permanent oversight committee. And throughout his service on the Intelligence Committee, Senator GOLDWATER has pursued that oversight function.

Senator GOLDWATER has led the Intelligence Committee to several notable achievements, among them the Intelligence Identities Protection Act of 1982 and the Central Intelligence Agency Information Act of 1984. He has also led successful efforts for reform of the CIA retirement system to protect the rights of spouses and for support of a National Historical Intelligence Museum.

The Intelligence Identities Protection Act has put an end to the malicious naming of names of purported U.S. intelligence personnel by certain publications. And it has done so without any chilling effect on the press.

The CIA Information Act is affording needed Freedom of Information Act [FOIA] relief to the CIA, which will save it much money and improve security for sensitive programs. And this will be done without affecting the amount of information obtained by FOIA requesters. Indeed, the Act will result in better CIA processing of FOIA requests for information that can in fact be released.

Mr. President, Senator GOLDWATER thus leaves us an important legacy: The lesson that we can indeed help the intelligence community without harming the open society that we are all trying to protect. His work has been in the great tradition of the Senate, lifting issues out of the fog of ideology and coming up with practical solutions to problems.

Under Senator GOLDWATER, the Intelligence Committee has broadened its oversight of intelligence activities and has taken steps to make that oversight more effective. The committee pays greater attention nowadays to Department of Defense intelligence units; our oversight has encouraged that Department to clarify lines of authority and generally to improve its management of clandestine intelligence activities. The committee also laid the groundwork for more effective oversight of covert action activities, reaching a written agreement with the Director of Central Intelligence on reporting responsibilities.

Senator GOLDWATER also presided over a superb buildup of intelligence capabilities, which was sorely needed after several years of inordinate budgetary constraints and which began when he was vice chairman. We will miss his presence when we consider intelligence budgets. But we are heartened by the fact that Senator GOLDWATER, now chairs the Armed Services Committee, to which that budget is sent each year on sequential referral. We are confident that the Nation's intelligence community will be treated fairly by that committee.

Mr. President, I just said that we would miss Senator GOLDWATER's presence when we considered the intelligence budget. Let me broaden that: We will miss BARRY GOLDWATER constantly. He is, as we all know, a nonsense Senator who understands both the importance of intelligence and the need to improve it. He may on occasion have to suffer fools, but he is never fooled by them. He has been—and I truly hope that he will continue to be—a source of wise counsel to all of us in military and intelligence matters.

Senator GOLDWATER has left our Intelligence Committee, Mr. President, but he will always be welcome. We value him greatly, and I plan—with his indulgence—to consult him regularly during my term as chairman.

All of us on that committee who have had the opportunity to serve with him have learned lessons, in terms of our approach as U.S. Senators to the responsibility of intelligence and intelligent oversight of intelligence, that we will never forget and for which we will always be most grateful to BARRY GOLDWATER.

SENATOR GOLDWATER: 19 YEARS OF OUTSTANDING SERVICE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I want to join my colleagues in praising Senator BARRY GOLDWATER for 8 years of outstanding service on the Intelligence Committee.

As one of the original members of the intelligence panel, Senator GOLDWATER showed the same kind of perseverance that he has brought to all of his legislative responsibilities. During his tenure, first as vice chairman, and starting in 1981 as chairman, Senator GOLDWATER has been a stalwart supporter of the intelligence community and fought diligently to protect the role it plays in keeping America safe and secure.

I have no doubt that Senator GOLDWATER, in his new role as chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, will continue to do everything possible to see that the United States maintains the highest standards in our national security.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I did not know all of that was going to go on or I would not have come in. But I would be lying if I did not say to my distinguished friends that I am greatly appreciative of their remarks.

I can say honestly that without the gentleman sitting next to me here, PAT MOYNIHAN, of New York, we never could have pulled the committee together and accomplished what we have accomplished with everybody working toward one goal. And I wish to publicly thank you, PAT, for all that you have done.

I wish to thank all of the members of the committee and members of the staff for the great work that they have done.

Intelligence is the basis on which we make all of our moves in this country, in fact in the world. I am happy to say that I believe our intelligence community, the American intelligence family, has improved tremendously over the last 8 years. Under the leadership of Senator DURENBERGER, it will improve over the next 8 years, and I hope the years past that, although I may not be around to watch it. But it will be fun from wherever I am looking at it.

Mr. President, I want to thank Senator DURENBERGER for his kind remarks. I wish him every success as chairman of the Intelligence Committee for the next 2 years. I was honored to have had the opportunity to serve on the Intelligence Committee for over 8 years, and especially to serve as chairman for the last 4 years. I know that I can state without fear of contradiction that those of us who served on the committee during this period left the Intelligence Committee a stronger, more effective, and more efficient organization.

COMMENDING ROBERT RUHL SIMMONS, FOR DISTINGUISHED SERVICE TO THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, during most of my chairmanship on the Intelligence Committee, I was fortunate to have the support of a truly outstanding staff director, Robert Ruhl Simmons.

Rob Simmons came to the committee after military service in Vietnam and a 10-year career in the CIA's clandestine service. His talents and knowledge for dealing with people and problems were invaluable to me. He played a key role in the successful effort to enact legislation to protect the identities of undercover intelligence operators and to protect CIA files from unwarranted search and review.

These laws will continue to help the intelligence community to more effectively accomplish its mission over the years to come.

Mr. President, I believe that Rob Simmons' contributions to the committee and to the national security deserve special recognition.

Mr. President, at this point I send a resolution to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration. It is my understanding that this resolution has been cleared on both sides of the aisle.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota ask unanimous consent to temporarily set aside the pending resolution?

Mr. DURENBERGER. Yes, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will report.

The bill clerk read as follows:

S. RES. 57

Whereas, Robert Ruhl Simmons served with honor and distinction in the Republic of Vietnam as an officer in the United States Army;

Whereas, Robert Ruhl Simmons subsequently devoted a decade of his life to service with the Central Intelligence Agency, advancing the national security of his country through the successful accomplishment of sensitive missions overseas under difficult and dangerous circumstances;

Whereas, Robert Ruhl Simmons continued his selfless dedication to public service on the staff of Senator John H. Chafee of Rhode Island, and as a member of the staff of the Select Committee on Intelligence;

Whereas, Robert Ruhl Simmons displayed outstanding leadership, judgment, and effectiveness in bringing his skills and expertise to bear as Staff Director of the Select Committee on Intelligence during the period November 1981 to January 1985, providing invaluable assistance to Chairman Barry Goldwater and the other Members of the Committee;

Whereas, Robert Ruhl Simmons played a key role in the enactment of legislation to protect the identities of undercover intelligence officers and intelligence agents;

Whereas, he helped lead the successful effort to enact legislation to protect the operation files of the Central Intelligence Agency from unwarranted disclosure;

Whereas, his steady-handed management skills, his ability to productively channel the creative energies of a diverse staff, and his diligent representation of the Committee's interests at the highest levels of government during periods of turbulence as well as tranquility in the relationship between the legislative and executive branches were crucial in enabling the Select Committee to fulfill its statutory responsibilities related to congressional oversight of our nation's intelligence activities: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, that the United States Senate express and record its deep appreciation to Robert Ruhl Simmons for his dedication, loyalty, integrity, and distinguished service to the Select Committee on Intelligence, the United States Senate, the national intelligence mission, and the national security of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KASTEN). The Senator from New York

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, as the distinguished chairman of the Armed Services Committee and my dear friend BARRY GOLDWATER has just stated, the services of Rob Simmons as staff director of this committee have been singularly not uncharacteristic of his previous career; but certainly at this point, the highest public service he has performed, they should augur, I would think, higher service to come. It would scarcely be possible to consider a more important one.

If we have achieved the purposes in the Senate, and to a degree we have, of keeping our committee both informed and effective in a situation where those who most need to know are often by definition the least capable of learning, it is because of his experience, his integrity, his absolute trust, the absolute trust in which he was held by the members of the committee and the consequences of that in the executive branch.

The public never says thanks very well. On the other hand, there are not many youths who have the Senate pass a resolution on their behalf. I will hope he will consider this effect on his life as important as we consider it to be.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I am glad that both my colleagues, Senator GOLDWATER and Senator MOYNIHAN, have spoken to the resolution offered by the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. President, I am especially pleased to pay tribute to a fine member of the staff of the Select Committee on Intelligence.

Robert Ruhl Simmons, who will shortly be leaving this town for the rocky coast of his native Connecticut, has served on the committee staff for 4 years—and over 3 years as staff director. He has helped keep our ship afloat in some terrible storms, with both courage and dignity.

Those fine qualities come naturally to Rob Simmons, as much as inheritance as the rocky fields and chill New England winters that have forged his family over generations. The call of duty was never something that Rob could ignore.

After graduating from Haverford College, Rob Simmons served as a U.S. Army officer in Vietnam. In 1969, he joined the Central Intelligence Agency, where he served for nearly 10 years. Rob received two Bronze Stars as an Army officer, and several awards and citations during his CIA career.

Rob Simmons came to the Hill in 1979 as a legislative assistant to Senator CHAFEE of Rhode Island. As a member who worked closely with Senator CHAFEE on SALT and defense issues in those days, I can testify to the high caliber of Mr. Simmons' work.

When Rob Simmons came to the Intelligence Committee staff in 1981, he was immediately thrust into the legislative battle over the Intelligence Identities Protection Act. Now that the act has been law for 2 years and civil libertarians see that it has not harmed our free press, it is hard to remember what emotion it caused. But that was a bruising fight, and Rob Simmons helped Senator CHAFEE to carry it through to a successful conclusion.

It was in November 1981 that Rob Simmons was named staff director by Senator GOLDWATER. This was the not-so-quiet period of the Casey investigations and Executive orders, hardly an easy time to take the helm. But Rob Simmons did so, and saw the Intelligence Committee through those trials and later ones—especially on Nicaragua.

The last 3 years have been hard ones, and were Rob Simmons a retiring person, I would wish him a quiet retirement. But I believe that most of us get stuck with precisely what we are seeking. So I wish Rob Simmons many more enjoyable years of blood and thunder, confident that he will find ways to spend them in continued service to his country.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DURENBERGER. I yield.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I wish to echo the comments of the distinguished chairman of the Senate's Intelligence Committee regarding Rob Simmons, and say that the admiration felt for him is shared equally by Senators on both sides of the aisle, especially those Senators who are serving and who served on the Senate Intelligence Committee.

I know of no time during the little over 5 years that I have been on the Intelligence Committee that Rob Simmons was anything but totally professional and totally responsive to the needs of all Senators. It did not matter what State they were from or what their party affiliation was, he was there foremost to do the Senate's business and to do the country's business.

Americans should feel proud that we have professionals such as Rob Simmons serving our country.

I thank the Senator for yielding.

COMMENDING SENATOR DANIEL PATRICK MOYNIHAN FOR EXCEPTIONALLY DISTINGUISHED SERVICE ON THE SENATE INTELLIGENCE COMMITTEE

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to temporarily lay aside the Goldwater resolution before us so that we might consider other resolutions from other Members.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, it is with great pride and pleasure I have the honor to send to the desk a resolution concerning my friend the senior Senator from New York (Mr. MOYNIHAN). I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The bill clerk read as follows:

S. RES. 58

Whereas, Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan, with unstinting devotion to the national security of the United States, served on the Select Committee on Intelligence from March 1977 until January 1985;

Whereas, Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan served as Vice Chairman of the Committee in the 97th and 98th Congresses in a spirit of bipartisanship and national interest;

Whereas, throughout his tenure on the Committee, Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan demonstrated a keen appreciation of the role of intelligence and through his leadership of the Committee has materially helped the United States remain free and at peace;

Whereas, Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan brought to his leadership of the Committee his extraordinary background as Ambassador to India and to the United Nations, service in the cabinets of Presidents of both parties, and a well deserved reputation as scholar, social critic, wit and raconteur;

Whereas, Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan is truly a tribune of the Empire State;

Whereas, Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan has throughout his career vigorously defended and enhanced the role of law at home and abroad;

Whereas, Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan may justly be proud of the immeasurable role he has played in strengthening responsible oversight of the Intelligence Community by the Congress;

Whereas, Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan by his efforts has added to the understanding and support by the American public of the necessary and constructive role that responsible intelligence gathering plays in maintaining the security of the United States; therefore be it

Resolved, that the United States Senate express and record its deep appreciation for Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan's exceptionally distinguished service to the Select Committee on Intelligence, to the Senate, and to the people of the United States.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, this resolution is intended as a heartfelt expression of the deep appreciation shared, I believe, by all members, past and present, of the Select Committee on Intelligence who have noted the contributions of PAT MOYNIHAN of that committee.

For the first 8 years of its existence, PAT MOYNIHAN has been one of the most active, committed, and effective Senators on the committee. From 1977 to 1981 he was one of the most hard working of its members, and since 1981, as vice chairman, Senator MOYNIHAN has provided strong and determined leadership to a committee wrestling with some of the most difficult and controversial problems it has faced in its short existence.

Senator MOYNIHAN had many, many accomplishments, both as a member and as vice chairman. Listing them would take far too much time and I suspect would only embarrass him, but let me point out three of the major areas where he made substantial contributions to an effective intelligence capability operating within the constraints of American law and values.

First, Senator MOYNIHAN was in the forefront of a broad consensus effort to rebuild a stronger and more effective intelligence community after it had been weakened by the distortions of the Vietnam war. This expansion began under President Carter and it continues under the present administration. It has been a bipartisan effort and it is one in which my friend from New York played a central role. He can take justifiable pride, along with our distinguished former chairman, Senator BARRY GOLDWATER, in ensuring that the intelligence agencies have the resources they need.

He can also take pride in the fact that he stressed that these resources and needs are not just the province of one political party, be it Democratic or Republican, but rather reflect the needs of the United States, and to that end he strove to make sure that there was the bipartisan consensus necessary to bring this rebuilding about.

Second, Senator MOYNIHAN has worked hard to ensure that the intelligence agencies act within the law. Part of oversight is to guarantee that the protectors of our freedom do not, through either overzealousness or bureaucratic inertia, encroach on liberties we as Americans take for granted. As a committee member and then as a vice chairman, Senator MOYNIHAN stood firmly for the rights guaranteed by the first and fourth amendments. At the same time, he rightly insisted that the greatest threat to the civil liberties and privacy of Americans is Soviet prying into our national life. Senator MOYNIHAN has worked to balance a firm commitment to basic American liberties against an urgent need to take effective measures against Soviet intelligence activities directed against our country.

Third, he has fought to make the United States a force for international law and peaceful resolution of disputes. I think he would be the first to recognize in this regard that the committee—actually, the entire Congress—has had difficulties with certain intelligence activities of recent date. All of us recall the painful episode of the mining of Nicaragua's harbors last year, followed by the dismal mishandling of Nicaragua's case against the United States in the World Court. I admire and respect PAT MOYNIHAN's taking the administration to task for the terrible blow done to American credibility by those fiascoes. In meetings since that time, he stressed to the committee that we all must take to heart the bitter lessons learned. As Senator MOYNIHAN has said, the challenge to our committee is to maintain unwavering vigilance over intelligence activities and to insist upon a full accounting at every turn.

Mr. President, there is so much that goes on within this committee which the public never sees; so much of the work is done behind closed doors, as it must. But it is during that time that we probably get more of an opportunity to really act as Senators, to bring to bear whatever our own backgrounds might be and whatever expertise we might have. In this regard, Senator MOYNIHAN has been invaluable, not only as a representative of a major and great State but one who has served, in administrations past, as Ambassador to the United Nations and as Ambassador to India, to provide not only a national, but an international perspective. It is a valuable asset that was relied upon by the whole Senate.

He also is one who, because of his expertise and knowledge, will continue to be a major voice, as he should be, in this area. We are grateful for that.

Mr. President, before requesting unanimous consent for adoption of this resolution, I shall also say a word of appreciation to my good friend and former chairman, the Senator from Arizona, Mr. GOLDWATER. I have worked with Senator GOLDWATER on the Intelligence Committee for 6 years. Prior to that time I served with him on the Armed Services Committee. I have nothing but admiration for his commitment to bipartisanship in the oversight of intelligence. Without running the risk of going into any of those secret hearings, I can think of only a handful of times in all the years we have served together on that committee where the Senator from Arizona and I ever disagreed. In very, very few instances, if I found myself in disagreement with him, I usually went back and tried to analyze just where it was I had made a mistake. Again, the great advantage to having Senator GOLDWATER as chairman was that we had a person who could bring a lifetime of experience to both national and international matters and to remind us, every time we saw something new in the committee, that it was not new, that he had seen it once or twice or three times before. That in itself was a valuable resource which could never be cataloged or overstated.

So his commitment to bipartisanship in oversight is one that BARRY GOLDWATER shares with PAT MOYNIHAN. If we could go through all of the things both of these men have done for the Senate and the country, I do not think we could point to anything better than the legacy they have left to the new chairman and myself in this bipartisanship spirit, and it is a legacy that I am determined to preserve.

I also, Mr. President, express my deep thanks to my departing colleagues from the Intelligence Committee, Senators GARN and CHAFEE, LUGAR and WALLOP, and Senators HUDDLESTON, BIDEN, and INOUYE.

If it is appropriate, at this time I ask unanimous consent for adoption of the resolution of appreciation by the Senate for the work of Senator MOYNIHAN on the Select Committee on Intelligence.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEAHY. Of course.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, before we act on the motion by my colleague from Vermont, I spoke earlier of the departure of our chairman, BARRY GOLDWATER, and the reality is that eight other members of the Select Committee on Intelligence, who have helped BARRY look good over the last number of years, have left us recently.

Our vice chairman has meant something special to me in my 6 years. Senator DANIEL PATRICK MOYNIHAN of New York, we all know, is a man of rhetorical eloquence and deep passion. In his 8 years on the Intelligence Committee he worked tirelessly to hold the executive branch to high standards of thoughtfulness and exposition. PAT MOYNIHAN rightly believes, if I judge him, that if a policy is not stated clearly it probably has not been thought through clearly, and although many of us so often despair of ever getting bureaucracies to understand that particular point, it does remain the essential standard for all of us, particularly those of us who will remain on the Intelligence Committee. We see ourselves thus in that particular regard as the inheritors of PAT MOYNIHAN's charge. We know that it must apply to our own thinking and our own writing as well as to those in the community and in the administration whom we oversee.

Mr. President, I will not miss PAT MOYNIHAN or BARRY GOLDWATER because they will both be here to be called upon, but it is those particular lessons that you can only learn in a committee around a particular issue that redirect and guide your thought processes, and for that I am particularly grateful to PAT MOYNIHAN and will continue to be.

Mr. PRESIDENT, Senator JAKE GARN of Utah was one of the original members of the Intelligence Committee. He played an important role in the crafting and adoption of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which brought foreign intelligence wiretaps under a constitutional regime for the first time. Senator GARN has been a faithful supporter of both the intelligence community and thoughtful intelligence reform. We will miss his counsel, but we hope that we will retain his support as intelligence budgets move through the appropriations process.

Senator JOHN CHAFEE of Rhode Island will be most remembered for his leadership on the Intelligence Identities Protection Act of 1982. His skill and determination were crucial in that effort, and he can look back with pride at a law that is doing its job well and has even won over many of those who originally opposed it.

Senator RICHARD LUGAR's 8 years on the Intelligence Committee included 6 in which he was our crucial link to Republicans on the Foreign Relations Committee. In that, as in all his work, he demonstrated his abundant wisdom and good sense. Winning his support was an essential step if the committee was to have influence on the floor or downtown. This is sure to remain true now that Senator LUGAR has become chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee. I look forward to years of fruitful cooperation between our committees, with such a level-headed veteran to work with.

Senator MALCOLM WALLOP of Wyoming made his greatest mark on the intelligence budget authorization process. His mastery of that material and dedication in dozens of subcommittee hearings made a signal contribution to the work of the committee. Senator WALLOP will also be noted as a man who kept the discipline of counterintelligence in everybody's mind. We will not forget his message that our intelligence agencies are most at risk when they convince themselves that there is no risk.

Senator Walter D. Huddleston of Kentucky will be remembered for his diligent pursuit of workable legislative charters for the intelligence agencies. While such charters have not been enacted into law, the ideas raised by Senator Huddleston over the years found their way into many executive orders and agency procedures. We will miss the almost tender way in which a set of Huddleston questions in a hearing would quietly pry the truth out of many a witness.

Senator JOSEPH BIDEN of Delaware served 8 years as our link to Democrats on the Foreign Relations Committee. His spirit and his incisiveness helped to focus the committee's attention, especially during its consideration of covert action matters. Senator BIDEN was also the father of the important Classified Information Procedures Act, which is now the Government's first line of defense against "graymail" tactics by defendants who threaten the disclosure of classified information in a trial.

Finally, Mr. President, I want to pay special tribute to our first chairman, Senator DANIEL K. INOUYE of Hawaii. Our debt to Senator INOUYE begins with the beginning, when he moulded the Intelligence Committee into an institution based upon nonpartisan professionalism and strict security. It was Senator INOUYE who blazed those paths of rectitude and convinced intelligence officials and policymakers alike to entrust our committee with the Nation's most sensitive secrets.

Senator INOUYE's achievements on the Intelligence Committee were many. He was instrumental in securing passage of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, the Intelligence Oversight Act, and the CIA Spouses Retirement Equity Act. His service as chairman was followed by years of leadership as chairman and then vice chairman of the Budget Authorization Subcommittee, and his powers of persuasion were a vital factor in gaining the budget increases that supported the current great rebuilding of intelligence capabilities.

Senator INOUYE's greatest legacy to his committee, however, must be his personal example. His commitment to the national interest, his understanding of how congressional oversight could contribute to that cause, and his skill at convincing colleagues of all persuasions to work together made him a rock to which all of us cleaved. Though he had already stepped down as chairman before I joined the committee, it was Senator INOUYE's standard against which we all have compared ourselves in the last 6 years.

Mr. President, if 2 years from now my own chairmanship may be seen as following in the footsteps of DAN INOUYE, then I shall be accounted a great success and our country most fortunate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York is recognized.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. After the distinguished chairman spoke with regard to those singular qualities of BARRY GOLDWATER, I happened to be sitting next to him, and I have to report once again that his response was unprintable and that it will have to remain so. It suggests that mine be equally brief, but for purposes of some balance, may I just recall the opening passage of Huckleberry Finn in which Huck says, "My name is Huckleberry Finn. You will know about me from a book called "Tom Sawyer" which was written by a Mr. Mark Twain, and mostly he told the truth."

I am deeply grateful to my colleagues for this occasion, the first of its kind in my experience. I would only insist that it does reflect the bipartisanship which has been preserved in this committee and without which in my judgment it cannot function. I see no more confirming prospect that it will continue to do so than the presence of the distinguished chairman and vice chairman, perhaps noting for the record what is too little observed; that the Senate has made the judgment that this committee should have a chairman and a vice chairman, not a chairman and a ranking member. In the absence of the chairman, the vice chairman presides, a singular assertion of this bipartisanship, and a condition we hope to see continue and which I fully expect will be continued.

I express my gratitude, after 8 years, for the kind remarks of my neighbor from Vermont and my friend from Minnesota.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I would like to express, for myself and on behalf of my colleagues, my appreciation to Senator GOLDWATER and Senator MOYNIHAN. In their respective capacities as chairman and vice-chairman of the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, they have performed their duties in extraordinary fashion.

Theirs has been a thankless task. They have dealt with questions of grave importance to the national security interests of our country involving subjects of the utmost sensitivity. Because of the high degree of classification of most of those matters, the public may never know the magnitude of the service they have performed and how ably they have accomplished their tasks.

In their leadership of the Select Committee they have served the Senate well. They have served the Senate leadership well.

Under the provisions of Senate Resolution 400, which created the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence in 1976, a new system of intelligence oversight was created by this body to insure the most effective oversight of our intelligence agencies without public exposure of the country's most vital secrets. I believe that the system we created has served us well. And its success may in no small measure be directly attributed to the committee leadership which Senator GOLDWATER and Senator MOYNIHAN have provided.

The select committee has dealt with some very controversial issues. I know that the chairman and vice-chairman whom we commend today have at all times maintained as their priority the best national interests of our country. Their approach has always been to work toward bipartisanship and toward achieving committee consensus. They have set for the committee the highest standards of professionalism. They have been true safeguards of the national security.

I commend them both for a job well done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

The resolutions (S. Res. 56, S. Res. 57, and S. Res. 58) were agreed to.

The preambles were agreed to.

COMMENDATION TO PETER M. SULLIVAN FOR SERVICE ON SELECT COMMITTEE ON INTELLIGENCE

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution in this series and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 59) To commend Peter M. Sullivan for his able and dedicated service on the Select Committee on Intelligence.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, the resolution speaks the mind of the Senate in an explicit and forthright manner. Perhaps as much in that quality as in anything substantive, it reflects the character of Peter Sullivan, who has served us well these many years as minority staff director, as minority counsel, and, prior to that, in a series of Government positions beginning with service to Representative Hastings Keith, a distinguished former Republican Representative from Massachusetts.

Mr. Sullivan has brought to a subject that so easily makes its way into the elusive and the tenuous and the incomprehensible the very disciplined habits of an attorney of the finest training and the highest standards.

It is with great pleasure that we learned that the Department of Defense has asked him to come to a position of the highest responsibility where he will continue to deal with matters we have dealt with in this committee, but in open and public concerns, with respect to the degree to which the Soviets have complied with the treaties we have agreed to on arms control. That is something to which he brings the finest talents.

Mr. DURENBERGER. I am pleased to join in saluting Mr. Peter Sullivan, who recently left his position as minority staff director of the Select Committee on Intelligence to take a new assignment with the Department of Defense.

Peter Sullivan has given the select committee years of loyal and effective service, both as minority counsel and as minority staff director. His insight and moderation were especially valuable to the committee, and we will miss his wry perspective on affairs of state.

Mr. Sullivan leaves to become the legal expert on arms control compliance in the Defense Department. That is a position that will surely test Peter's equanimity. It will also make use of his hard-hitting investigative experience with the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations.

Although I regret his departure, Mr. President, I welcome the fact that Peter Sullivan will remain where we can get at him. For the Select Committe on Intelligence cares deeply about questions of arms control compliance and monitoring. We look forward to working with Peter in the years to come.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, Peter Sullivan served the Intelligence Committee ably, first as minority counsel, then as minority staff director, for over 4 years. He assisted us in dealing with the confirmation hearings of Mr. William Casey as Director of Centeral Intelligence, handling the difficult and controversial legal matters associated with that hearing. He provided wise counsel on the many legal and legislative matters the committee dealt with over the ensuing 4 years and was, without a doubt, one of the hardest working members of the staff. His long work hours and insistence on mastery of the detail of extraordinarily complicated legal issues became a byword among the committee staff.

Mr. Sullivan now leaves the Senate for service on arms control matters in the Department of Defense. I know he will serve as devotedly and ably there as he did on the Intelligence Committee. He is a dedicated patriot and an outstanding public servant. I wish him well in his new endeavor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 59) was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The resolution, with its preamble, reads as follows:

S. RES. 59

Whereas, Peter M. Sullivan served as Minority Staff Director of the Select Committee on Intelligence from July 24, 1984 to January 18, 1985 and as its Minority Counsel from February 1981 to July 1984;

Whereas, Mr. Sullivan represented in these capacities not only the former Vice Chairman of the Select Committee, Senator Moynihan, but also both the Minority and Majority Members of the Committee;

Whereas, Mr. Sullivan demonstrated through this period both excellent ability and exceptional dedication in resolving the numerous and important issues that arose before the Committee;

Whereas, Mr. Sullivan demonstrated during his period of service to the Select Committee qualities of keen analysis, especially with regard to legal issues; persistence and dedication in doing the work of the Committee; and a sense of humor endearing him to his fellow staff members;

Whereas, through his service to the Committee Mr. Sullivan has played an important role in enhancing the national security of the United States through the effective oversight by the Senate of the foreign intelligence activities of the United States Government;

Whereas, Mr. Sullivan has gone on to a position with the Department of Defense in which his legal skills, experience derived from service on the Select Committee, and traits of character will be well utilized in improving the national security of the United States through the careful analysis and assessment of arms control agreements: Therefore be it Resolved, That the United States Senate express and record its appreciation to Peter M. Sullivan for his able and dedicated service to the Select Committee on Intelligence.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, it would appear that once more we have saved the Nation, so I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DURENBERGER). The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. MOYNIHAN addressed the Chair.

Mr. LEAHY. I withhold that, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York.

PROTECTING THE PRIVACY OF AMERICANS' COMMUNICATION FROM FOREIGN ESPIONAGE

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, the New York Times of January 28 carries an account about the site of the new Soviet Embassy in Washington, currently under construction, which in intelligence circles is described as the biggest giveaway since Peter Minuit got Manhattan in 1626 for the equivalent of $24.

The site is at the summit of Mount Alto north of Georgetown. Its acquisition was so extraordinary a bargain for the Soviets because, in the words of an anonymous senior American intelligence official quoted in the article, "from an eavesdropping standpoint, (it is) one of the most magnificent vantage points in Washington."

From their new buildings, the Soviets will be able to do much more easily and thoroughly that which they do already, in somewhat more constraining circumstances, at virtually every one of their diplomatic properties in the United States: listen in on phone calls between Americans. We have available the statement of the highest ranking Soviet defector to date, Mr. Arkady Shevchenko, that Soviet electronic espionage specialists are working full-time in suburban Glen Cove, in the vicinity of several private firms who are surely the object of continuous eavesdropping. We know that the Soviet diplomatic residential compound in the Riverdale section of the Bronx is a center of such electronic eavesdropping, within range of the vast network of financial and other commercial transactions that occur millions of times each day in New York City over the phone.

The practice would be illegal if undertaken by an agency of the U.S. Government, or by any private concern. Yet it continues to be done by hostile foreign governments—which in the process gather considerable information about American commerce and the private lives of many, many individuals, as well as information vital to the military defense of the Nation—without penalty.

As the Times article of Monday also notes, I have earlier this month introduced—for the third time in my two terms in the Senate—legislation to provide to the President authority expel foreign diplomats who are discovered to be engaged in electronic eavesdropping on American citizens.

The bill is S. 12, and was introduced on January 3, 1985. A longer discussion of the issue and the details of the legislation appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date.

The legislation has been referred to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relatons, where I hope it will engage the attention of the Chairman and other members. Hearings to examine the problem would certainly seem to be in order.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the article to which I have referred be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Jan. 28, 1985]

HILL WITH TOPFLIGHT ELECTRONIC VIEW

WASHINGTON—In intelligence circles, the site of the new Soviet Embassy in Washington is considered the biggest give-away since Peter Minuit got Manhattan in 1626 for the equivalent of $24.

Near the intersection of Wisconsin and Massachusetts Avenues where upper Georgetown and Glover Park crest at the top of a hill called Mount Alto, 350 feet above sea level, the site has a commanding view of the entire Washington area.

In the arcane world of electronic spying, the site is described as an ideal place to monitor government, commercial and private communications flowing into, out of and over Washington. "From an eavesdropping standpoint, that's one of the most magnificent vantage points in Washington," a senior American intelligence official said.

By contrast, intelligence officials say, the new United States Embassy in Moscow is being built in the middle of the city where surrounding buildings will limit the ability to monitor Soviet communications.

STILL SOME DEBATE IT

How the Soviet Union ended up with the Mount Alto site remains the subject of considerable debate 16 years after Washington and Moscow reached agreement on the construction of new embassies. That agreement, six years in the making, provided new sites in exchange for each other and permitted each country to bring in its own construction crews to work on the interior of its new chanceries, to prevent the installation of bugs.

The main reason the Russians got such a favorable spot, according to intelligence and State Department officials, was that electronic eavesdropping was relatively primitive at the time and American officials were not aware of the site's potential advantages. The property, once used by a Veterans Administration hospital, was also surplus Federal land.

The United States and the Soviet Union have each invested billions of dollars in trying to intercept the communications of the other. Much of this is done from satellites. In addition, the United States and its allies, particularly Britain, maintain ground stations in Europe and Asia to track Soviet communications.

The Soviet Union, in turn, operates a large ground station in Cuba that American intelligence officials say is able to monitor almost all domestic communication, including telephone and television, that is relayed to and from the East Coast by satellite. Electronic spying is considered vital by both countries. One of the most sensitive applications, according to intelligence officials, is monitoring the electronic data, telemetry, that are transmitted by missiles and rentry vehicles in tests.

The tracking of missiles as they fly down range is carried out by satellites, ground stations and specially-equipped aircraft and ships. This kind of monitoring has played a key role in the ability of both countries to verify compliance with arms agreements.

The Soviet eavesdropping in Washington is designed to pluck off any stray unsecured Government communications as well as communications involving commercial transactions, largesly unprotected, and even private telephone conversations, intelligence officials say. The United States tries to do the same in Moscow. For a brief period in the 1970's, according to intelligence officials, the United States was able to monitor the radio telephone conversations of Soviet leaders as they drove around Moscow in their limousines.

The site of the new Soviet Embassy, the officials say, provides a clear sight line to the State Department, the White House, Defense Department, Commerce Department and a number of important foreign compounds, including the British, West German and French Embassies. Even Central Intelligence Agency headquarters in suburban Virginia is partly in electronic view. It also offers a largely unobstructed view of several key mircowave relay towers that serve as the conduit for most telephone and data-transmission communications from Washington to other cities on the East Coast.

GYMNASIUM IS INCLUDED

When completed in several years, the 10-acre Soviet compound will have a nine-story apartment building, a small school, a gymnasium, an eight-story administration building and a residence for the ambassador. The apartment building and school are already occupied.

Exotic antennas and dish-shaped receivers will be tucked away in these buildings, according to American intelligence officials. They said some were already in operation.

To counter Soviet spying from the new site as well as from other Soviet installations in the area, not to mention satellites and ships off shore, the Government, working with the phone company, has tried to route nearly all sensitive calls in the Washington area or underground cables. In addition, the Government has invested heavily in the development and installation of secure telephones. Government messages to posts abroad are encoded.

MOYNIHAN WANTS A CHANGE

Many commercial and most private communications, however, are not handled on secure lines or encoded.,

Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan, Democrat of New York, has tried unsuccessfully since 1977 to get Congress to approve a foreign surveillance prevention act that would give the President the power to expel any foreign diplomats found to be involved in electronic spying. When he introduced the legislation again earlier this month, Mr. Moynihan called it "an effort to address what must properly be regarded as the gravest threat to Americans' right to privacy which has yet arisen."

"I refer to the well-known Soviet practice," he said, "of making use of its diplomatic establishments in this country to monitor the telephone conversations of Americans on a truly sweeping scale."

CONGRATULATIONS TO MAYOR BLACKWOOD OF MOUNT VERNON, NY

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, 6 days ago, a historic event occurred in New York: Ronald Alexander Blackwood was elected mayor of the city of Mount Vernon, our State's 11th largest city. In so doing, he has become the first black to be elected a mayor in New York State.

This is not just another milestone for equality in our country, though it is surely that.

It also recognizes the promise of opportunity for which our country stands. Mr. Blackwood immigrated to the United States from Jamaica three decades ago, "seeking a better life," he told the New York Times. "I wanted to better myself. Where better to do that than in America?"

Where indeed, Mr. President.

Not only New Yorkers, but all Americans should be proud of Mount Vernon's new mayor. His success should be inspiring to us all.

Mr. President, without objection I ask unanimous consent that the New York Times' "Man in the News" article about my friend Mayor Blackwood be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, January 30, 1985]

MILESTONE FOR NEW MT. VERNON MAYOR, RONALD ALEXANDER BLACKWOOD

(By Lena Williams)

MOUNT VERNON, N.Y., Jan. 29.—Ronald A. Blackwood, who came from Kingston, Jamaica, to this southern Westchester County city 30 years ago "seeking a better life," today became the first black to be elected a mayor in New York State.

"This should have happened a long time ago—a long time ago," Mr. Blackwood said. "Perhaps we will reach a point, when we will no longer speak of our achievements in terms of firsts."

Mr. Blackwood was chosen in a special election Jan. 25 to fill the remaining three years of the unexpired term of Mayor Thomas E. Sharpe, Jr., who died last October. The County Board of Elections confirmed today that Mr. Blackwood, a Democrat, had a 1,087-vote lead over his opponent, John R. Branca, a Democrat who ran on the Republican line.

For Mr. Blackwood—who was raised by his grandmother while his mother, a domestic worker, tried to make a living for him and his brother—the victory represents the "end of a long struggle" and the fulfillment of a dream he had when he left his homeland for America.

PLACE IN HISTORY BOOKS

"I wanted to better myself," he said. "Where better to do that than in America?"

He said, however, that he never thought the dream would carry him to top office in this city or afford him a place in New York State's history books. At the same time, he said the road to success was paved with "obstacles, disappointments and frustrations."

Mr. Blackwood, a four-term City Councilman, had been a registered Republican from the time he became a citizen in 1960 and had traditionally been one of the top vote getters in Mount Vernon. But he was twice rebuffed for the party's nomination for mayor.

His first rejection came in 1976. At the time, Mr. Blackwood as president of the City Council was serving as acting mayor of Mount Vernon after Mayor August Petrillo died suddenly, in 1979. Mr. Blackwood lost the party's nomination by 13 votes.

Friends and supporters of Mr. Blackwood and many in this city's black community accused the Republicans of denying him the nomination because he was black. Mr. Blackwood accused the party leadership of being "out of step with the times."

"They weren't afraid that I would lose the election," he says now. "They were afraid I might win."

Disheartened, Mr. Blackwood accepted an invitation four years ago to join the Democratic Party. The invitation was extended by the late Mayor Sharpe, a former Republican turned Democrat, David R. Ford, chairman of the city's Democratic committee, and former Representative Richard L. Ottinger, a Democrat whose district included Mount Vernon.

"Mayor Sharpe drove me up to White Plains to the Board of Elections to change my registration card," Mr. Blackwood remembers with a smile. "I felt I couldn't get anywhere with the Republican Party. It reached a point where it no longer made sense to pursue a career as a Republican."

Last November, Mr. Blackwood unanimously won the Democratic nomination for mayor in the special election.

Today, the County Board of Elections confirmed what Mr. Blackwood declared shortly after the polls had closed here last Friday night: that he was indeed "the new mayor of this city."

With returns reported from all 55 election districts, including more than 400 of some 700 absentee ballots, Mr. Blackwood had 9,681 votes. His opponent, Mr. Branca, had 8,594 votes. Because the Board of Elections cannot officially certify the results until this Friday—the deadline for all absentee ballots, postmarked Jan. 24, to be received and counted at the Board headquarters—Mr. Blackwood cannot officially be sworn in as mayor until then.

Even if Mr. Branca were to receive all of the approximate 300 absentee ballots unaccounted for, it would not be enough to overcome Mr. Blackwood's lead. Nevertheless, Mr. Branca has refused to concede.

But since last Friday night, Mr. Blackwood has been proceeding as if the job were his. The morning after the election, he walked the streets of this city thanking supporters and accepting congratulations.

He said he has not specifically "mapped out my order of business" once he is sworn in, but lists three areas that will be looked into—"first and foremost" contract negotiations with the city's police department. He said he also wanted a review of all departments and staffing to "see where there are deficiencies and where performance can be improved" and a review of development projects already underway.

Ronald Alexander Blackwood was born in St. Andrews, Jamaica, on Jan. 19, 1926. His first home when he left Jamaica was Mount Vernon—"a one-room apartment on the south side." While taking accounting courses at Westchester Community College, Mr. Blackwood got his first job here as a secretary with Electronics for Medicine, which was acquired by Honeywell Electronics in 1979. He now works as a contract administrator at Honeywell Medical Electronics Division in Pleasantville, N.Y.

Mr. Blackwood received a bachelor's degree in management from Elizabeth Seton and Iona College in New Rochelle, N.Y., last June, after eight years of study. He met his second wife, Ann Griffin, a schoolteacher, at a wedding. They were married in June 1976. He has a daughter, Helen Marie, 28, a lawyer, from a first marriage, which ended in divorce.

Throughout the campaign, Mr. Blackwood tried to downplay race as an issue and attempted to assuage fears that his election would dramatically change the "color" of those who work at City Hall or lead to a "massive exodus" of whites from the city.

But no matter how hard he tried, he said shaking his head good naturedly, the issue of race came up.

"I was doing some door-to-door campaigning at a cooperative apartment on the north side of town," Mr. Blackwood recalled, laughing as he retold the story, "and this elderly white man pulls me aside and said he wanted to ask me a personal question."

"The man said that some people were saying I wasn't black," Mr. Blackwood continued. "I told him that I was not running as a black, but as the qualified candidate. The man listens to what I have to say, then looks me in the eye and says: 'So tell me, are you black?' "

TRIBUTE TO REPRESENTATIVE GILLIS LONG

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, last week Congress lost one of its finest and most loved Members. Throughout his 14 years as a Representative, Gillis Long served his State of Louisiana and his country with a sense of dedication and conscience that made him one of the truly effective legislators in our national assembly. I knew Gillis as a friend and held for him the utmost respect as a Congressman. I know I speak for my colleagues in the Senate and the House when I say we mourn his passing and will miss him dearly.

Gillis Long had a well-deserved reputation for being a master of consensus building and legislative procedure. He was one of the relatively few who really knew how to make the wheels of Government work. From his post on the House Rules Committee, there was scarcely any bill or piece of major legislation he didn't help shape or guide over the legislative shoals.

Gillis was an insider's insider in Congress, but he never took his eyes off of the need to keep the Democratic Party unified and in touch with the needs of the American people. He left one of his biggest marks as chairman of the House Democratic Caucus for the 97th and 98th Congresses, a job that tested his skills as a consensus builder to the fullest. He helped hold the House Democratic delegation together through the trying times of 1981–82 when it seemed the "Boll Weevils" and more liberal Democrats might permanently part ways.

Gillis used the caucus chairmanship as a platform from which to explore new policy directions for the party. He appointed the task force whose work culminated in September 1982 with the joint release, along with Congressman TIM WIRTH, of the report, "Rebuilding the Road to Opportunity," espousing the belief that we Democrats had to move beyond the New Deal and start emphasizing new economic productivity rather than just redistribution of wealth. He was also a member of the Congressional Joint Economic Committee, where he developed an expertise in and pushed the study of such crucial issues as the international trade competition and world energy supplies.

One of the things, however, for which I admired and respected Gillis the most was his steadfast stand as a supporter of civil rights legislation, a stand that cost his seat in 1962 when support for civil rights wasn't always a popular thing to do. But Gillis was a man of conscience, and by 1972 his district had come around to his way of thinking. Our National Congress was so much the richer for his presence.

We wish his wife, Cathy, well in this time of sorrow. We'll miss you, Gillis, but you'll always be with us in memory.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair, in its capacity as a Senator from the State of Minnesota, suggests the absence of a quorum.

The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRAMM). Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR EXTENSION OF TIME FOR ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that morning business be extended until 4 p.m. today under the same terms and conditions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TRUCKING DEREGULATION IMPACT

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, as a member of the Senate Surface Transportation Subcommittee, I have been a long-time opponent of trucking deregulation because of the negative economic impact it has had on rural States like South Dakota, and because of its adverse effects on transportation safety.

The adverse economic impact of truck deregulation to rural State truckers, shippers, and consumers was well documented in a December 15, 1983, oversight field hearing in Sioux Falls, SD (Senate Hearing 98-627, Serial No. 98-55) which focused on the impact of the Motor Carrier Act of 1980.

I recently received some very interesting and illustrative correspondence from one of my constituents, Mr. Robert A. Appelwick, a highly respected businessman in my home State and president of Apple Lines, Inc., of Madison, SD, which sheds light on the general public's perception of the decline in safety since deregulation.

Knowing of my interest in this issue, Mr. Appelwick was kind enough to send me a copy of an unsolicited letter he received from Mr. R.M. Hovland of Rochester, MN, congratulating Apple Lines for its safety policies, but expressing grave concern over the general deterioration of trucking safety since deregulation.

Mr. President, I am very proud of the independent safety efforts taken by Apple Lines and commend Bob Appelwick for his outstanding efforts in this area. But I share the concern of Mr. Hovland and Bob Appelwick over the safety problems caused by deregulation. Because I found these letters so illustrative of the problems I have pointed out in the past, and because these letters say it much better than I could, I urge my colleagues to read them carefully.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the letters of Mr. Appelwick and Mr. Hovland be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

APPLE LINES, INC.,
Madison, SD, October 23, 1984.

Senator LARRY PRESSLER,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR LARRY: Please find enclosed a copy of a letter we received recently from Mr. R. M. Hovland of Rochester, MN.

You will note in the second paragraph of this correspondence that the individual indicates that deregulation has had an impact on his perception of the safety of the highways. It was my personal projection that there would be an impact with respect to safety as a result of the relaxation of the governmental oversight of the operations of the motor carrier industry as a public utility in our economy. This letter serves as the first confirmation of my expectations.

I am certain that you appreciate my inability to measure the public response with respect to the confirmation of the concerns which I had with regard to safety. For me to go out and solicit comments from the public would have been meaningless.

However, to receive an unsolicited letter of the type herein enclosed makes a very strong statement when an individual will take the time and energy to forward to our company his remarks with respect to his concern with regard to his personal safety in the utilization of our highway system and at the same time offer Apple Lines' a compliment with respect to our policies regarding safety.

I hope this information will be of interest and value to you in guarding the interest and concerns of the public.

Yours very truly,
ROBERT A. APPELWICK, President.

ROCHESTER, MN,
October 6, 1984.

President and General Manager,
Apple Truck Lines,
Madison, SD.

DEAR SIR: This is to congratulate you on your policy of posting an 800 number on the rear of your truck trailers to let you know how your drivers are doing.

We do a great deal of traveling. In the past we have had great respect and admiration for truck drivers, but since deregulation our experience has been terrible. Actually, but by the grace of God, we were almost killed in Montana by an independent trucker doing 70 on a mountain road, U.S. 89, near Browning, middle of the road, small bridge, missed us by 2 inches due to our moving to within 6" of edge of shoulder with a 15' drop off and stopping before we arrived at the narrow bridge abutment. The approaching truck had just finished completing a blind curve and was straddling the no passing lines when he thundered across the bridge.

Truck drivers often pass in no passing zones and they ride your bumper at 55 because most of them travel at 70.

Just returned from vacation and had the experience of being passed on a hill, no passing zone, when the trucker was on my side blew his air horn and started cutting in, had to hit the gravel shoulder as did the on coming car.

I have no complaint with the driver of trailer 7004 on U.S. 52 heading south at about 4:00 p.m. on Thursday, October 4, near Rochester, Minnesota. I saw that 800 number and planned to call in the courteous way he passed. The last two digits of the 800 number had been scratched off, so I couldn't call. Apparently not everyone is in agreement with your policy.

Perhaps this policy should be extended to the trucking industry, an ID number on the trailer. Some lives might be saved if truckers knew their actions could be reported, good or bad.

The trucking industry does have a problem now, but I'm pleased to see you are trying to do something about it.

Sincerely

R.M. HOVLAND.

VEHICULAR RECORD-KEEPING REQUIREMENTS FOR BUSINESS DEDUCTIONS

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, very briefly, I am pleased to cosponsor, and therefore support, legislation to amend the Internal Revenue Code to return sanity to the record-keeping requirements necessary for a business expense deduction for the use of an automobile or truck.

Prior to 1985, a taxpayer had to maintain adequate records or other evidence to qualify for the business deduction. However, a virtually unknown provision in the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984 changed those rules substantially. In fact, the changes will place an onerous and unreasonable administrative burden on businesses of all sizes, their employees, and the agriculture community by requiring taxpayers to maintain contemporaneous, detailed records. The new record-keeping rules, in my opinion, have the potential of adversely affecting worker productivity by requiring substantial employee time in maintaining records. I believe that we in Congress should be concentrating on efforts to "get Government off our backs" rather than increasing its presence in the private sector. Therefore, I have cosponsored S. 260 which will repeal the recently enacted contemporaneous record-keeping requirements. To the extent abuses occur, Congress can find a more reasonable manner to address them without penalyzing honest taxpayers and placing an unnecessary burden on business.

The Treasury Department announced last Friday that they will make changes in the originally proposed regulation regarding the contemporaneous requirements. However, as I stated earlier, I believe the requirements that existed prior to January 1, 1985, were reasonable and adequate without placing additional governmental redtape on honest business men and women. I will therefore continue to support and push for repeal of the record-keeping requirements included in the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984.

JOHN R. CALDWELL—DEDICATED PUBLIC SERVANT

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I would like to call the Senate's attention to an individual who recently retired from an outstanding and selfless career of public service.

I refer, Mr. President, to John R. Caldwell, who was the downstate Illinois chief of staff for my former colleague, Senator Charles Percy. I have known John for many years. I first met him when he was in the Illinois secretary of state's office. He was concerned about bringing safety to the roads of Illinois. He became so knowledgeable in auto and traffic safety that he was asked to testify as an expert witness throughout the Midwest. John served in the secretary of state's office for 8 years and was Senator Percy's invaluable assistant for 16 years in Springfield and all of downstate Illinois.

Besides government service, John is active in many municipal, county, and State charities. He served as chairman of the Community Chest and war bond drives during World War II. He also served as chairman of the Easter Seals drive and Crippled Children's Project. John is a model citizen in our Springfield community, our State and Nation. On Tuesday, January 29, 1985, former Senator Percy and I hosted a civic luncheon in John's honor in Springfield.

His outstanding dedication serves as a good example of the great man John Caldwell is. I am proud that John Caldwell is a fellow Illinoisan, and even prouder to call him my friend.

JOHN EARL FETZER—MARCH OF DIMES "HUMANITARIAN OF THE YEAR"

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, the name John Fetzer has long been associated with excellence and achievement in both the broadcasting field and American League baseball. Sole owner of the Detroit Tigers for 21 years he is a self-made man who parlayed radio pioneering into a fortune but never lost his youthful love for baseball and other sports. John's leadership and support of Detroit have earned him the honor of being selected as Humanitarian of the Year by the March of Dimes.

Indiana-born but a Michigan resident virtually all his adult life, John Fetzer built a broadcasting empire by developing the Fetzer Broadcasting Co. from a one-lung station into a corporation with nine radio-television outlets. An engineering authority and a respected leader among broadcasters, he has been called upon frequently by the U.S. Government for critical assignments in the communications field.

In spite of his many other interests, John has found plenty of time for baseball—both on the major league level and at Tiger Stadium, where his strong leadership has developed one of the most efficient organizations in professional sports. When he became president of the club in 1962, he proudly stated that "I've been a Tiger fan for 30 years." John's first aim has been the development of a winning team for Detroit and Michigan. It was under his leadership that the Detroit Tigers won the World Championship in 1978. Then when he sold the Tigers in 1983 he guaranteed that his winning team stayed in Detroit.

John Fetzer's position in baseball is as eminent as that in broadcasting. His inventive mind and sharp sense of personal relations made him one of the strong figures on the American League scene and in interleague affairs. He was a member of baseball's executive council from 1961 through 1965 and was named again to that top-level policy group in 1974. He played a prominent role in drafting bonus payment legislation as a member of a special interleague committee and was instrumental in player pension plans as a member of the American League committee on that subject. In 1963, John Fetzer advanced a revolutionary plan for a weekly series of "baseball spectaculars" that developed into the successful Monday night baseball series, also used in other sports.

I am delighted to come to the Senate floor to salute John Fetzer, the Michigan March of Dimes Humanitarian of the Year, for his numerous achievements and commend him for his continued leadership.

VOLUNTEER TAX HELP FOR ELDERLY—ONE OF GOVERNMENT'S BEST INVESTMENTS

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, millions of Americans are either gathering their tax records or preparing their tax returns. This is frequently a time consuming and difficult task. But, it is often more complicated for older Americans because they may be exposed to new tax rules upon reaching age 65.

Those who have stopped working and have interest, dividends, or other income not subject to withholding may need to make quarterly estimated tax payments. Older persons who contributed jointly with their employers to a pension must compute the taxable portion of their pension payments. This can be a complex computation, even for expert tax preparers.

Social Security benefits may now be taxable for certain higher income persons. The majority of older Americans will not have sufficient other income to pay tax on their Social Security. However, millions of elderly individuals must still make a complex computation in order to make this determination.

Fortunately, many aged persons are helped by the Tax Counseling for the Elderly Program [TCE]. The American Association of Retired Persons' [AARP] Tax-Aide Program is by far and away the largest of the TCE programs. Tax-Aide volunteers prepared more than 1.3 million returns in 1984, free of charge.

The history of Tax-Aide demonstrates that volunteer tax consultants can improve taxpayer compliance. This not only assures that taxpayers pay what is lawfully due the Government, but also reduces Internal Revenue Service administrative costs.

Tax-Aide provides another valuable service because IRS has repeatedly stressed that no taxpayer should pay more tax than is legally required. However, many older persons overpay their taxes each year or file a return when this is not necessary.

Some are baffled by the tax forms and the recent changes in the tax law. Others are unaware of helpful deductions, credits, exemptions or exclusions. Tax-Aide helps assure that older taxpayers receive the tax benefits to which they are entitled under the law.

My good friend and colleague on the Senate Treasury, Postal Services, and General Government Appropriations Subcommittee—Senator ABDNOR, the distinguished chairman of that subcommittee—shares my enthusiasm about the value and achievement of the AARP Tax-Aide Program. He recently published an article about the importance of Tax-Aide. I, too, want to reaffirm my strong support for Tax-Aide and the TCE Program.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article by Senator ABDNOR—entitled "Volunteer Tax Help for Elderly—One of Government's Best Investments"—be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

VOLUNTEER TAX HELP FOR ELDERLY ONE OF GOVERNMENT'S BEST INVESTMENTS

(By Senator JIM ABDNOR)

The stories of savings are countless.

An elderly woman on a very limited income has donated $300 to campaigns, mistakenly thinking they were bills to be paid and not realizing they were tax-deductible contributions. Another older person, a retired government employee, had not known that he could receive a tax refund for the contributions he had made to his pension fund.

These people, and hundreds of thousands more like them, have been helped by one of the most useful, efficient programs affiliated with the federal government. The Tax-Aide program is a cooperative agreement between the Internal Revenue Service and the American Association for Retired Persons to assist elderly persons in filling out their tax forms at no charge.

As chairman of the Senate subcommittee that approves funding for the IRS, I'm a big supporter of the Tax-Aide program. In fact,

I've been leading the fight to maintain funding for the very small administrative budget the program requires.

The budget is small because Tax-Aide is largely a volunteer program. Last year, over one million senior citizens were assisted in filling out their tax returns by 19,000 volunteers associated by the American Association of Retired Persons. In South Dakota, in 1983, there were 112 Tax Aide centers operating and approximately 2,200 persons received volunteer tax filing assistance.

It's been shown in many studies that elderly taxpayers consistently pay too much each year because they don't take advantage of perfectly legal tax breaks to which they are entitled. The AARP volunteers are trained in IRS-taught classes and are kept up to date on the latest changes in tax laws.

The small amount of federal money devoted to this program goes to maintain a small central staff to coordinate the program with the IRS and to keep volunteers current on new tax laws. Volunteers are also reimbursed for their out-of-pocket expenses.

This is one of the federal government's least expensive programs and one that I am most proud to support in that it fulfills a definite need and brings a greater amount of fairness to hundreds of thousands of American taxpayers.

THE YEAR OF THE EXECUTIONER

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I want to call to the attention of my colleagues portions of an article by Colman McCarthy entitled "The Year of the Executioner," which appeared in the Washington Post on Saturday, January 26, 1985. As Mr. McCarthy points out, there are over 1,400 men and women on death row in America today. The pace of executions in the United States has increased dramatically over the past 2 years and will undoubtedly continue to rise since the number of people sentenced to death increases by about 250 each year.

The brutalizing impact of executions upon American society has been the subject of numerous studies by proponents and opponents of capital punishment. In his book "Legal Homicide, Death as Punishment in America, 1864-1982," William J. Bowers, director of the Center for Applied Social Research at Northeastern University, concludes that:

> Studies of the long-term effect and short-term impact of executions give ample indication that executions may have—contrary to prevailing belief—not a deterrent but a brutalizing effect on society by promoting rather than preventing homicides.

Rather than promoting the cycle of violence in America, we should consider alternatives to the death penalty which will make our society less prone to violence.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Jan. 26, 1985]

THE YEAR OF THE EXECUTIONER

(By Colman McCarthy)

With only a few weeks gone by, 1985 promises to be the Year of Death for American prisoners. In the first 16 days of January alone, four capital-punishment killings occurred. In 1984, 20 men and one woman were executed. That was 16 more than 1983, which was double the rate of 1982. The quick pace for all these last miles means that Chief Justice Warren Burger's disdain for the appeals and re-appeals that delay executions is now shared by the lower courts.

The frequency of death has diminished its new value. Executions now rate only wire-service stories, with back-page placement. To prevent boring the readers, execution stories routinely focus on the human side of this inhumanity. Colorful details are provided on the last meal, the last gasps and the last rites.

What need to be told are the stories of the last years of the prisoners. Despite the crowds outside the prison gates that cheer at executions, and despite the satisfaction that the vengeful seem to crave, Justice William Brennan is right: "Even the vilest criminal remains a human being possessed of human dignity."

That sentiment gets a ferocious mocking by many supporters of the death penalty. These fevered ones are not to be taken with credence because they have so distanced themselves from death row that the people living there are no longer seen as the human beings that they are.

Among those who best understand that humanity is present on death row are the criminologists who have interviewed the condemned men and women. It is not a population easily kept up with. Four years ago, the nation's 35 warehouses of death were stocked with 700 waiting people. Now the number is 1,400 and rising. With the United States as the only Western industrial nation that kills prisoners, we now have still another bolstering of our reputation for solving problems through violence.

One of the criminologists who has gone into the death rows is Prof. Robert Johnson of the school of justice at American University. His 1981 book, "Condemned to Die: Life Under Sentence of Death," is based on interviews with 35 men on Alabama's death row. Johnson found the expected realities: men who were poor, of low self-esteem and from harsh backgrounds. Life near the execution chamber was an extension of the unstable and violent environments of these men before murder was committed.

The get-tough-with-criminals view is that murderers are in some inexplicable way subhuman. Johnson dismisses such simplism: "To deny the humanity of violent men is to deny a part of ourselves and our society. For violence, after all, is an all too common failing of individuals and societies. Not until the basic humanity of the murderer is felt and understood can the work of explaining and ameliorating his violence begin. At this point one discovers that violence is not some spectre or disease that afflicts some of us without rhyme or reason, but rather that it is an adaption to bleak and often brutal lives."

At the moment, Johnson is involved in researching the effects of deathwork on some of the guards in the killing chambers: "The business of carrying out executions is almost as dehumanizing as being killed. The job of preparing the prisoners is a wrenching process that society tends to ignore or distance itself from. If you look at people trained to be torturers, they lose some of their humanity. So the executioners lose theirs. This can be extended to society. We have so removed ourselves from the day-to-day lives of people who turn to violence that when we get around to killing them, it is all disembodied and not very real to us."

This is not new to the current American death wave. In the 1957 "Reflections on the Guillotine," Albert Camus wrote that even those who themselves may suffer "the administrative murder that is called capital punishment" can be numb to its horror. In the days "when pickpockets were executed in England, other pickpockets exercised their talents in the crowd surrounding the scaffold where their colleague was being hanged. Statistics drawn up at the beginning of the century in England show that out of 250 who were hanged, 170 had previously attended one or more executions."

To write with mercy—as do Camus and Johnson—about murderers is often interpreted, first, as spineless liberalism and, second, insulting to the victims' families. There is no logic in the leaps to those conclusions. Mercy and care are owed to the violated families. Liberals have been leaders in the victim-rights movement.

What needs to be remembered now is that our rising execution rate drops that much lower America's claim to be a humane society.

RESOLUTION

Whereas, The Appalachian Trail has become one of the best known and most popular long distance hiking trails in the world; and

Whereas, The Appalachian Trail stretches nearly 2,100 miles from Springer Mountain, Georgia, to Mount Katahdin, Maine; and

Whereas, The Appalachian Trail, in passing through Pennsylvania, follows a course which runs through the Cumberland Valley and which includes the Townships of Middlesex, Monroe, Silver Spring and South Middleton, in Cumberland County; and

Whereas, This traditional and historic course has, throughout the years, remained compatible with the residents, the industries and the farming activities of the valley, despite occasional conjunction with public roadways which have developed adjacent to the trail; and

Whereas, The National Park Service of the United States Interior Department has indicated a desire to relocate the Appalachian Trail from its existing route along the public roads of the Cumberland Valley to a path located on State lands and private lands; and

Whereas, The general area accommodating the Appalachian Trail in the Cumberland Valley is an interesting blend of rural and urban life, served by four major highways, including I-81, the Pennsylvania Turnpike and U.S. Routes 11 and 15, and is a thriving community which should not be limited in its growth and development by the imposition of a legal barrier through its heartland; and

Whereas, The relocation of the Appalachian Trail at places other than its present route will be tantamount to the creation of a new public thoroughfare which severs extremely fertile productive farmland and creates a legal barrier between adjoining lands; and

Whereas, The National Trails System Act (Public Law 90-543, 82 Stat. 919) provides in section 1246(b) "that a substantial relocation of the rights-of-way" of the Appalachian Trail shall be by Act of Congress; therefore be it

Resolved (the House of Representatives concurring), That the General Assembly memorialize the Congress to prohibit legislation that would allow the National Park Service to substantially relocate any portion of the Appalachian Trail within a particular state or commonwealth, unless its General Assembly has voted approval of the relocation; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted to the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, the President pro tempore of the United States Senate, each member of Congress who represents a state or a congressional district through which passes the Appalachian Trail and to each member from Pennsylvania elected to the United States Senate and the United States House of Representatives.

POM-9. A resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Alabama; to the Committee on Finance.

S.J. RES. 16

Whereas, the textile and apparel industry is our state's largest manufacturing industry, employing 93,000 Alabamians, representing one-third of our state's total manufacturing employment, and with payrolls over one billion dollars annually; and

Whereas, the textile/apparel manufacturers contribute millions of tax dollars to the economic, social, and cultural growth and success of our state, as well as thousands of dollars annually for scholarships, universities, technical schools, and for other support in the field of education; and

Whereas, the textile/apparel industry is of vital importance to the continued prosperity of our state and its people, and since there have been recent plant closings and a loss of 5,000 jobs in Alabama due to the flood of imports which are at record high levels—increasing 56% over the same period in 1983, and realizing for every 1,000 jobs lost in textiles/apparels, an additional 1,000 jobs are lost within a wide range of businesses and services as a result; now therefore,

Be it resolved by the Legislature of Alabama, both Houses thereof concurring, That we urge the President and Congressional leaders in Washington to take proper action to assure fair trade and preserve American jobs in our textile/apparel industry throughout the nation.

Be it further resolved, That a copy of this resolution be mailed to President Reagan and to each member of the United States Senate and House of Representatives.

POM-13. A resolution adopted by the Los Angeles County Board of Supervisors urging Congress to assist in any way possible in feeding the starving multitudes in Africa and preventing their needless deaths; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

POM-14. A resolution adopted by the American Philosophical Association, Western Division, opposing any United States support for military attacks on Nicaragua and to the use of United States funds and/or personnel in such attacks; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

POM-15. A resolution adopted by the General Assembly Council of the Presbyterian Church relating to United States policy in Central America; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION No. 948

Whereas, The American people have been profoundly shocked and deeply saddened by the abhorrent conditions in Ethiopia, where an estimated six to ten million people face starvation. Graphic television news reports have brought the astounding reality of the Ethiopian famine to the forefront and stirred the conscience of all Americans; and

Whereas, Unfortunately for the Ethiopian people, a good part of the blame for this tragic situation rests with the dictatorial Ethiopian government whose shortsighted and self-serving policies have done little to alleviate this disturbing situation. Indeed, the current regime has proven itself to be not only untrustworthy but also totally incapable of responding to the situation; and

Whereas, The American public and United States government have traditionally responded to such crises with great compassion and an outpouring of money, food, and other aid. Indeed, various charitable organizations in our nation have already received millions of dollars in donations from individuals, businesses, and the federal government. However, in light of the Ethiopian government's obvious shortcomings and total failure to deal with the situation we call upon the President of the United States and the United States Congress to marshal all available resources, including air transport and personnel, to provide and deliver emergency food aid directly to the starving masses of Ethiopia; now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That we hereby memorialize the President of the United States and the United States Congress to use all available resources to deliver emergency food aid directly to the starving people of Ethiopia; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, and the Michigan congressional delegation.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. DECONCINI (for himself and Mr. SYMMS):

S. 321. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to implement a flat rate tax system; to the Committee on Finance.

FLAT RATE TAX SYSTEM

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I am today introducing a bill that will have the effect of restructuring our entire method of Federal income taxation, both for wage earners and for business income. The bill puts in place a modified flat tax system. All income would be taxed at the same rate of 19 percent; it would be taxed only once and as near the source as possible; the poorest households would pay no tax; and the tax will be simple—the tax return may be able to fit on a single page.

This bill is the direct result of the enormous dissatisfaction felt by the American people with our present income tax system. The present tax code is too complex, uncertain, and riddled with loopholes. It is seen as promoting economic inefficiencies and because of its steep rate structure, encourages many people to seek out tax shelters or to just plain cheat on their taxes. A release on January 28, 1985, by the Washington Post indicates that 63 percent of the American people would favor an alternative tax system as proposed by the Department of the Treasury over the present system. I'm sure an even greater majority would endorse the general concept of a tax reform that made our tax system more fair, easier to comply with, and which took a smaller bite out of a person's income.

We must return to the basic principles upon which a sound tax system must stand: equity, efficiency, and simplicity. My bill eliminates all tax preferences, deductions and credits. These only lead to contempt and abuse of the tax system. The Tax Code should exist as a means of raising revenue and not to achieve results that cannot be accomplished through normal expenditures.

Constituents in my State of Arizona have frequently and resoundingly indicated their support for major tax reform at the Federal level. Simplification and lower rates are what they demand. Many commentators and activities of the past year indicate that a simmering tax revolution is brewing. To solve the problem before it becomes completely chaotic the Congress must seriously consider creating a tax system based on new more equitable principles. I believe that a modified flat tax system is the answer.

I applaud the efforts of my colleagues such as Senators BRADLEY, KASTEN, ROTH, and QUAYLE, who in the past have proposed tax reform measures of their own. I applaud the President for instructing his Department of the Treasury to study the issue and propose a plan. However, after reviewing all of the other proposals, I remain convinced that the tax system embodied by the bill I am introducing today, and which is very similar to previous such legislation I introduced in the 97th and 98th Congresses, remains the best solution to our problems associated with taxation.

My bill is based on the work of Drs. Robert Hall and Alvin Rabushka of the Hoover Institute at Stanford University. They are the authors of the book "Low Tax, Simple Tax, Flat Tax" published in 1983 that served as a catalyst for the tax reform movement. Most recently, they have authored a new book titled "The Flat Tax" released in January of this year. Their works reflect an outstanding scholarly effort directed at forging a workable flat tax system.

They detail the problems of the present system and provide a thorough and readable discussion of how a flat tax might work. Although all the other reform proposals to a degree achieve the ends of equity, simplicity and efficiency, I believe the Hall-Rabushka proposal as embodied by my bill clearly stands out as the simplest and also the fairest of all the proposals. In all individual income brackets by category, taxpayers will pay less under my bill than they pay under the current system.

By the same token, wealthy taxpayers who take full advantage of sheltering opportunities offered by the present law, will begin to pay their fair share of taxes. But with a uniform low rate of 19 percent, I honestly feel the great majority of the American people will more willingly, and honestly, be prepared to shoulder their share of keeping the Government funded. The essence of what a good tax system must contain was outlined by Secretary of the Treasury Mellon years ago in his book "Taxation: The People's Business":

The problem of the Government is to fix rates which will bring in a maximum amount of revenue to the Tressury and at the same time bear not too heavily on the taxpayer or on business enterprises. A sound tax policy must take into consideration three factors. It must produce sufficient revenue for the Government; it must lessen, so far as possible, the burden of taxation on those least able to bear it; and it must also remove those influences which might retard the continued, steady development of business and industry on which, in the last analysis, so much of our prosperity depends.

Furthermore, permanent tax system should be designed not merely for one or two years nor for effect it may have on any given class of taxpayers, but should be worked out with regard to conditions over a long period and with a view to its ultimate effect on the prosperity of the country as a whole.

I have never viewed taxation as a means of rewarding one class of taxpayers or punishing another. If such a point of view ever controls our public policy, the traditions of freedom, justice and equality of opportunity, which are the distinguishing characteristics of our American civilization, will have disappeared and in their place we shall have class legislation with all its attendant evils. The man who seeks to perpetutate prejudice and class hatred is doing America an ill service. In attempting to promote or defeat legislation by arraying one class of taxpayers against another, he shows a complete misconception of those principles of equality on which the country was founded.

Any man of energy and initiative in this country can get what he wants out of life. But when that initative is crippled by legislation or by a tax system which denies him the right to receive a reasonable share of his earnings, then he will no longer exert himself and the country will be deprived of the energy on which its continued greatness depends."

I believe that a modified flat tax system, by restoring incentives and closing present inequalities in the tax law, is the key to longterm economic development and taxpayer satisfaction.

Reforming and simplifying the Federal income tax has been one of the most important issues in national policy throughout the 1980's. Widespread consensus exists in the White House, the Congress, and around the country at large that the time is ripe for comprehensive change. Prominent members in both parties have put forth bold tax-restructuring plans that would change the current individual and corporate income taxes beyond recognition. Hearings have been held before the Senate Finance Committee, the House Ways and Means Committee, and the Joint Economic Committee on proposals to reform and simplify the tax system.

I propose legislation to simplify and reform the tax system. My plan puts a 19 percent flat-rate tax on all income after a large personal allowance. It provides an investment incentive of a 100-percent, first-year writeoff. It is the most fair, efficient, simple, and workable plan on the table. This plan is based on the work of two Stanford University scholars, Robert E. Hall and Alvin Rabushka, who have spent several years developing the analysis and details of this plan. They have published a new book, "The Flat Tax" (Hoover Press, 1985), that sets forth the principles of the flat tax, and explains why this tax reform plan is good for America. The proposed legislation rests on serious academic scholarship, not political expediency or the claims of special interest groups.

EVALUATING TAX SYSTEMS

To see why the proposal represents sound national policy, it is important to be able to analyze alternative tax systems. Economists generally agree that sound tax policy should aim at certain goals. First, taxes should distort as little as possible the prices resulting from the interaction of supply and demand in the market. Tax policy should strive for neutrality between investment and consumption and among products and industries. Government should not use its power to alter prices to favor any one industry or producer. To give but one example, import duties protect domestic producers from competition, penalize consumers, and raise the costs of imputs for exporters.

A tax is efficient if it brings minimal price distortions. An efficient system of taxation would collect money without seriously influencing individual decisions on how much to work and to save and where to invest. It would not discourage people who put in longer hours to earn more income. It would not reward borrowing and penalize savings. It would not tax savings twice—once when the money is earned and again when the money earns a return. An efficient system would not be riddled with exemptions, deductions, and credits that direct money to investments with lower tax liabilities instead of to investments that increase real output at the highest rates of return.

A second important standard against which to evaluate systems of taxation is equity or fairness. Historically, equity has always meant equal treatment of equals. This interpretation conforms to American constitutional guarantees of equal treatment before the law. To discriminate among equal classes of taxpayers is arbitrary, capricious, and generally regarded as wrong. So, for example, if two families earn identical incomes, this doctrine of equity would imply that each should contribute identical shares in taxation.

A uniform, or proportional, tax meets the norm of horizontal equity. Every taxpayer bears taxes in direct proportion to his income. As incomes double, triple, or grow tenfold, tax obligations increase at the same rate.

The advent of the Great Depression and the New Deal programs that followed in its wake brought a new dimension to the concept of equity. Ability to pay, or vertical equity, was regarded as a hallmark of sound tax policy. In this view, fairness means that high-income earners should pay higher fractions of their incomes in taxes than low-income earners.

Under current tax law, hundreds of legal loopholes exist that permit some millionaires to pay no taxes whatsoever, a violation of the norm of vertical equity. Wealthy investors can exploit tax shelters that reduce total income to a very modest level of taxable income. Application of a pure vertical equity norm would preclude such loopholes to ensure that those who can afford to pay more do so.

Efficiency and equity are only two of the standards by which to evaluate tax systems. Yet another is simplicity. The notion of simplicity encompasses the comprehensibility of the system, the ease with which taxpayers can figure out how much they owe, and how much time and effort they have to put into filing their tax returns. It also reflects the extent to which taxpayers have to consult expert counsel from their lawyers or accountants either to compute their taxes or to take advantage of tax-saving devices. The current U.S. income tax system is a nightmare of complexity. A truly simple system would require no more than a postcard-sized form that all literate persons could easily complete.

The basic document that governs the Federal income tax is the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, which has been amended by major tax-writing efforts in 1964, 1969, 1971, 1976, 1977, 1978, 1981, 1982, and 1984. These periodic amendments were not minor modifications. The Joint Committee on Taxation issued a 411-page document explaining the changes embodied in the 1981 act; they issued an equally long document for 1982. Many of the changes introduced new loopholes into the code, and every new loophole further narrowed the tax base. The Government's need for revenue required that high tax rates be maintained on the decreasing share of national income that remained subject to taxation, promoting other groups to petition Congress for preferential tax treatment. The number of tax-expenditure items rose from 50 in 1967 to 104 in 1981, at a cost in lost tax revenues that rose from $37 billion to $229 billion.

In 1982, the Tax Code contained 109 tax subsidy items, costing the Treasury $243 billion. In just 1 year, five new items received tax subsidy status. This annual increment in preferential tax treatment, at ever-increasing cost to the Treasury, is the postwar pattern of American tax legislation. The 1984 act is estimated to run to 1,000 pages. Because the tax system is so open for special interest legislation, there are thousands of groups and individuals registered to lobby the U.S. Government for preferential tax changes. Each group fights taxes that hit its clients or tries to secure new benefits for them. Every time the tax-writing committees of Congress sit down to work, millions of people stand to gain or lose billions of dollars.

THE EFFICIENCY OF FEDERAL INCOME TAXES

There are two important dimensions to the inefficiency of the present tax system. First, it biases economic activity against the most socially rewarding forms of work, investment, and entrepreneurial activity, thus reducing overall national well-being. Examples include special treatment of owner-occupied housing at the expense of renting, leveraged investments stemming from deductibility of interest payments, investments that warrant tax credits such as solar energy devices, and syndicated art prints made from lithographic plates, to name a few. These and other tax shelters play havoc with efficiency in investment. Also, the very high marginal tax rates in existence today encourage a good deal of outright cheating and underground economic activity. This is not efficient for either the private economy or the collection of Federal receipts.

The second dimension of this inefficiency is the cost the current system imposes on individual and business taxpayers just to comply with a complex set of forms and instructions, as compared with, say, a simple, postcard-sized form.

There are a number of broad distortions to overall economic efficiency. The chief villain is high tax rates. Twenty years ago, few Americans paid high marginal tax rates on their income. Today, millions of middle-class Americans face high marginal rates that were intended only for the very rich just a short while ago. Eighty-eight percent of all taxpayers in 1961 paid marginal rates in the 20- to 22-percent range, 10 percent paid from 23 to 31 percent, and a trivial number paid over 32 percent. In 1979, in stark contrast, 45 percent exceeded rates of 23 percent, and 18 percent paid at rates exceeding 32 percent. This last category, all by itself, paid well over half of all Federal income taxes. To be precise, the top one-quarter of income earners pays about three-fourths of all income taxes, with marginal tax rates ranging from 30 to 50 percent. It is easy to see why they pay so much attention to sheltering income from taxation, a legal form of tax avoidance, or to engaging in underground activities, an illegal form of tax evasion.

The tax base is less than half of the national income. We got into that situation by granting selective relief in the form of preferential tax treatment to well over a hundred special economic activities. The Treasury Department exempts from taxation or gives tax credits to a wide variety of business and personal investments. The tax treatment of business activity is, in effect, a haphazard industrial policy that biases business and investment decisions against maximum economic benefit—efficiency—and for tax-advantaged treatment.

When individuals and businesses arrange their financial affairs and investments on the basis of tax advantages, instead of the production of more income, the economy as a whole suffers. The Treasury, collecting fewer tax receipts, suffers as well.

Sheltering income has become a major industry, consuming an ever-larger share of the Nation's top talent. Tax lawyers number some 50,000 to 60,000, accountants who worry about tax-related issues range from 100,000 to 200,000 in number, and sellers of tax shelters now surpass 100,000. Financial planning is a rapidly growing profession. A reasonable estimate might place at a half-million or more the number of people who earn very handsome livings from helping taxpayers cope with, take advantage of, or circumvent the Tax Code. Using a conservative average figure of $50,000 annual income for members of the tax-avoidance profession, taxpayers pay $25 billion and more to support this burgeoning industry. It is jokingly said that a massive simplification of the Tax Code would create a white-collar recession by throwing a half-million people out of work, not to mention costing the jobs of the tens of thousands who aid H&R Block and other tax-preparation firms on a part-time basis during tax-filing season.

The economic loss from distortions induced by the Tax Code is a $100 billion dollar figure. Direct tax-avoidance costs come to $25 billion or more in the form of purchasing expert advice.

A major cause of the poor revenue performance of the income tax is tax evasion, which is a polite word for cheating. A flood of books and articles has appeared in the past few years trying to determine the causes and size of the underground economy. Estimates of the size of the underground economy range up to several hundred billion dollars.

Cheating is widespread. The IRS estimates that tax evasion cost the U.S. Treasury Department $29 billion in 1973, $87 billion in 1981, and a likely $120 billion in 1985. These sums exclude unreported income from drugs, prostitution, and gambling, which represent more than another $10 billion lost in taxes.

Where does most cheating occur? Not among wage earners, for whom the IRS estimates underreporting at less than 2 percent. Unreported income from interest ran to 16 percent, which explains why the IRS tried so hard but failed, due to heavy lobbying from the banking industry, to get legislation adopted that would require banks to withhold a portion of interest payments and send those funds directly to the Treasury.

Unreported income from dividends was 16 percent; from capital gains, 22 percent—which is why brokerage firms must now report every transaction on a form 1099 to the IRS—from rents and royalties, 50 percent; and from self-employment income, 40 percent. For 1981, reported income in these last two categories came to $21 billion and $68.5 billion, respectively, which means that the Treasury lost at most $33.3 billion. Self-employed middle- and upper-income households cheat to an incredible degree. The current system fails to collect almost half of the taxes it should from noncorporate business income. This evidence confirms that the tax system is unfair to wage earners, who cannot easily cheat when their income comes solely from wages and salaries on which taxes are directly withheld.

COMPLIANCE COSTS

There is yet one further element of inefficiency in the current income tax: the cost to the average American of preparing his or her annual income-tax return above and beyond the purchase of an accountant's or lawyer's services. Federal reporting is a growing and notorious burden for individuals and businesses who must comply with the information requirements of several dozen governmental agencies. The President's Office of Management and Budget has determined that Federal tax forms alone comprise 78 percent of all Federal reporting requirements. Excluding the time for compliance with State forms and the outlays on professions assistance, the most conservative estimate of the compliance costs for the Federal income tax exceeds $10 billion.

THE COSTS OF INEFFICIENCY

The costs associated with the inefficiency of the Federal income tax are extensive. Distortions from pursuing tax-advantaged investments in the form of lost output may exceed $100 billion. Compliance costs, both in filing and buying expert advice, exceed $35 billion. Revenue lost to the Treasury due to evasion exceeds $120 billion. Considering that the entire individual and corporation taxes only brought in about $350 billion in 1984, these costs in economic and fiscal inefficiency are nothing short of phenomenal, and all by themselves would warrant, indeed demand, a complete reform of the system.

THE EQUITY OF FEDERAL INCOME TAXES

Judged on the basis of horizontal equity, the current Federal income tax is a complete failure. By now the reason is obvious. The aggressive taxpayer can select from a shopping list of lawful deductions and happy—or unhappy—circumstances to lower his total income to a much smaller adjusted gross income and a still smaller taxable income. It is not surprising that people believe their neighbors do not pay their fair share of the tax burden. Nor does this story encompass evasion, the underreporting of income or exaggeration of deductions, which annually increases in volume. Much of the hue and cry for comprehensive tax reform stems from growing discontent over the lack of horizontal equity in the system.

If the U.S. income tax mocks the principle of equal treatment, how does it fare against the canon of vertical equity, the view that ability to pay is the basis of fairness in allocating the tax burden?

One problem with analyzing the distribution of the tax burden by income classes is that the treatment of individuals within any one class can vary over an enormous range. After all, an average is the result of adding up the total within the class and dividing by the number of persons in the class. In any income class, some may pay no taxes and others may pay a very high share of their income in taxes. Thus, although the aggregate distribution of the tax burden by income class displays considerable progressivity, class-based analysis masks the wide variety of tax treatments different individuals within any one class experience.

There is yet a more serious problem: the treatment of income from both incorporated and unincorporated businesses. First, in the individual income tax, accurate reporting of wage and salary income runs at 98 percent. For self-employed persons, it is a much lower 60 percent, and the rate is a still lower 50 percent for rents and royalties. If all other deductions remain the same, a salaried person with the exact same income as a renter or self-employed businessman—after deducting the cost of producing income—pays much higher taxes. Thus, the present system is grossly unfair to wage earners as compared to those who receive their income from business activity. Indeed, the failure of business operators to pay their lawful tax obligations is one reason why tax rates remain so high and wage earners are so heavily burdened.

SIMPLICITY OF FEDERAL INCOME TAXES

The income tax took effect in 1913 after three-fourths of the American States ratified the amendment to the Constitution of the United States. In that first year, the personal income-tax return, form 1040, was two pages long, and the accompanying instructions filled only two pages. Moreover, only 0.4 percent of the American population had to file a return. 1983 was another story. A complete form 1040 booklet included 10 separate schedules and 46 pages of instructions to assist taxpayers in preparing their returns. The index to this hefty brochure contained 139 entries, and the order blank on the inside rear cover listed an additional 55 forms and instructional booklets that taxpayers could request by mail. Still other forms and publications are not even listed in the 1040 package.

Reflecting this complexity is the growth of commercial tax preparation. Thirty years ago, only 10 to 15 percent of the population sought professional help to complete their tax returns. By 1976, the figure reached 45 percent, and it now exeeds 50 percent.

The Internal Revenue Code of 1954, as amended, contains thousands of pages of tax regulations. It enumerates rules, exceptions to the rules, and exceptions to the exceptions. The complexity of the code has made it impossible to design a simple tax form or to write clear easy-to-follow instructions for the filer.

Some statistics on the Tax Code are mind-boggling. The entire Code of Federal Regulations, which includes all general and permanent laws in force in the United States, has 50 different titles filling more than 180 volumes. Title 26, the Internal Revenue Code, is responsible for 14 of these volumes, of which 8 are just for the income tax. Title 26 occupies 14 inches of library shelf space. The eight volumes for the income tax fill 5,105 pages. The 1981 Economic Recovery Tax Act amended some 89 separate sections to the Tax Code. To explain these changes, the staff of the Joint Committee on Taxation published a 411-page booklet. It takes more than a full-time job to keep abreast of changes in the law and regulations.

THE HALL-RABUSHKA PROPOSAL

The Hall-Rabushka plan represents a complete plan for a whole new tax system. Their system puts a uniform low tax rate on a comprehensive definition of income. Because its base is so broad, the tax rate can be set at 19 percent, but still raises the same revenue as the current tax system. The tax on individuals is fair and progressive—the poor pay no tax at all, and the fraction of income that people pay in taxes rises with income. The system is simple and easy to understand and comply with—tax returns for both families and businesses are simple enough to fit on postcards. And the tax operates on the consumption-tax principle—people are taxed on what they take out of the economy, not what they put into it.

Their system rests of a very basic administrative principle: Income should be taxed exactly once, as close as possible to its source. This principle seems obvious enough, but the tax system of the United States today violates it repeatedly. Some kinds of income—like fringe benefits—are never taxed at all. Other kinds, like dividends, are taxed twice. And interest income, which is supposed to be taxed once, actually escapes taxation completely in all too many cases, where clever taxpayers arrange to receive interest in a way that escapes the income tax.

In their plan, all income is taxed at the same rate. Equality of tax rates is the crux of the flat-rate tax. Its logic is much more profound than just the simplicity of calculation with a single tax rate. Whenever different forms of income face different tax rates or different taxpayers face different tax rates, the public takes full advantage of the opportunities to receive income in ways involving low rates. When the tax system permits deductions, deductions will be taken as often as possible against the income that pays the highest tax.

Limiting the burden of taxes on the poor is a central principle of tax reform. The current Federal tax system avoids taxing the poor, and I think it should stay that way. But again I stress that exempting the poor does not require graduated tax rates that rise to high levels for upper-income families. Graduated taxes automatically create differences among taxpayers in tax rates, with all the attendant opportunities for leakage. A flat rate, applied to all income above a generous personal allowance, provides progressivity without creating differences in tax rates.

Every tax system involves decisions about taxes on the return to saving and on investment incentives. The current tax system involves an incredible hodgepodge of provisions. As a general matter, it puts substantial tax rates on the earnings from savings. On that account, the economy is biased toward too little saving and too much consumption. But Congress has inserted a number of special provisions intended to spur investment and offset the bias. On the business side, there is an investment tax credit for purchases of equipment and accelerated depreciation deductions for both equipment and buildings. On the personal side, savings placed in Keogh and IRA accounts are excused from double taxation; they are taxed only once, at the time that retirement benefits are paid out. But the overall effect of the saving-investment incentives are spotty. In our tax system, there is a single, coherent provision for taxing the return to saving. All income is taxed, but the earnings from saved income are not taxed further.

AN INTEGRATED FLAT TAX

The flat tax applies to both businesses and individuals. Although the system has two separate tax forms—one for business income and the other for wages and salaries—it is important to think of it as an integrated system. When I speak of its virtues, like its equal taxation of all types of income, I mean the system, not one of its two parts.

Under this system, all income in the country is classified as either business income of wages and salaries. The system is airtight; the taxes on both types of income are equal. The wage tax has features to make the overall system progressive. The forms for both taxes will fit on postcards. The low tax rate of 19 percent is enough to match the revenue of the Federal tax system as it existed in 1984.

Although our business and wage-salary taxes will replace the present corporate and personal income taxes, it would be a mistake to think of the business tax as the replacement for the corporate tax and the wage-salary tax as the replacement for the personal income tax. Many types of businesses besides corporations will file our business tax form. Even within corporations, vastly more income is covered by the business tax than by today's corporate income tax.

THE INDIVIDUAL WAGE TAX

The individual wage tax has a single purpose—to tax the large fraction of total income paid as cash by employers to workers. It is not a tax system in itself, but one of two major parts of a complete system. The base of the tax is stated precisely and narrowly as actual payments of wages, salaries, and pensions. Pension contributions and other fringe benefits paid by employers are not counted as part of wages. In other words, the tax on pension income is paid when the retired worker actually receives the pension, not when the employer sets aside the money to pay the future pension.

The tax return for the wage tax is almost self-explanatory. To limit the burden of the tax on poor families, only earnings above a personal allowance are taxed. The allowance is $12,600 for a family of four in 1985, but would grow along with the cost of living in later years. All the taxpayer has to do is report total wages, salaries, and pensions at the top, compute the personal allowance based on marital status and number of dependents, subtract the allowance, multiply by 19 percent to computer the tax, take account of withholding, and pay the difference or apply for a refund. For about 80 percent of the population, filling out this postcard once a year would be the only effort imposed on them by the Federal tax system. What a change from the many pages of schedules filled out by the typical frustrated taxpayer today!

At a low flat rate of 19 percent, the individual wage tax would generate a large fraction of the revenue needed by the Federal Government. In 1983, wages, salaries, and private pensions were about $1,722 billion. Personal allowance that would have been deducted under the Hall-Rabushka system would have been about $640 billion (this estimate takes into account the number of people who would not be able to deduct the full amount of the allowance because their earnings were below the allowance). Tax revenues would have been $206 billion. For comparison, the personal income tax produced $290 billion in revenue in 1983.

For the 80 percent or so of the population that receives no business income directly, the individual wage tax will be the only tax to worry about. All interest payments will be put on an aftertax basis, an aspect of the buisness tax we will explain shortly. On the other hand, deductions for business expenses for people like commission salesmen are permitted, because they are among the 20 percent who file the business tax return.

Again, I stress that the wage tax is not a complete income tax on individuals. It taxes only wages, salaries, and pensions. The companion business tax picks up all other components of income. Together they form an airtight tax system.

THE BUSINESS TAX

In the first place, the purpose of the business tax is not to tax business. Fundamentally, people pay taxes, not businesses. The idea of the business tax is to collect the tax that the owners of a business owe on the income produced by the business. Collecting business income tax at its source avoids one of the biggest causes of leakage in the tax system today, the avoidance and outright evasion of imcome tax on interest and dividends.

Airtight taxation of individual business income at the source is possible because we already know the tax rate of all of the owners of the business—it is the common flat rate paid by all taxpayers. If the tax system had graduated rates, taxation at the source would be difficult or impossible. Suppose there were three or four different rates, as some modified flat-rate proposals call for. Then the business would have to find out the tax rate applicable to each of its owners, and apply that rate to the income produced in the business for that owner. The form would have at least five more lines for these computations.

But that is only the beginning of the problem. The Internal Revenue Service would have to audit a business and its owners together in order to see that the owners were reporting the correct tax rates to the business. Further, suppose one of the owners made a mistake, and later discovered he was in a higher tax bracket. Then the business would have to refile its tax form to collect the right tax. Obviously, this wouldn't work. Business taxes have to be collected from the owners, not from the source, if tax rates are graduated. This is a powerful practical reason for a flat-rate tax.

The business tax is a giant, comprehensive withholding tax on all types of income other than wages, salaries, and pensions. It is carefully designed to tax every bit of income outside of wages, but to tax it only once. The business tax does not have deductions for interest payments, dividends, or any other type of payment to the owners of the business. As a result, all income that people receive from business activity has already been taxed. Because it has already extracted its tax, the tax system need not worry about what happens to interest or dividends after they leave the firm. The resulting simplification and improvement in the tax system is enormous.

The tax would be assessed on all the income originating in the business, but it will not tax any income that originates in other businesses, nor will it tax the wages, salaries, and pensions paid to employees.

The business tax works in the following way: All income derives fundamentally from the sale of the products and services produced by the business. On the top line of the business tax form goes the gross sales of the business—its proceeds from the sale of all of its products. But some of the proceeds come from the resale of things the firm purchased; tax has already been paid on these items because the seller also has to pay the business tax. So the firm can deduct the cost of all the goods, materials, and services it purchases for the purpose of making the product it sells. In addition, it can deduct its wages, salaries, and pensions, for the taxes on these will be paid by the people receiving them, under our wage tax. Finally, the business can deduct all its outlays for plant, equipment, and land. A little later, I will explain why this investment incentive is just the right one.

Everything left from this calculation is the income originating in the firm, and is taxed at the flat rate of 19 percent. In most American businesses, a lot is left, and the revenue from the business tax is substantial. Many deductions allowed to businesses under current laws are eliminated in the Hall-Rabushka plan, including interest payments and fringe benefits. But the exclusion of these deductions is not an arbitrary move to increase the tax base. In all cases, the elimination of deductions, when combined with the other features of the system, moves toward the goal of taxing all income once at a common, low rate.

Eliminating the deduction for interest paid by businesses is a central part of the general plan to tax income at the source. It makes sense because I do not propose to tax the interest receipts of individuals. The tax that the Government now hopes (often in vain) that individuals will pay will assuredly be paid by the business itself.

My bill sweeps away the whole complicated apparatus of depreciation deductions and replaces it with something more favorable for capital formation, an immediate 100-percent first-year tax writeoff of all investment spending, also called expensing of investment. The Hall-Rabushka plan doesn't deny depreciation deductions; it enhances them.

Fringe benefits are outside the current tax system completely, which makes no sense. The cost of fringes is deductible by businesses, but workers are not taxed on the value of fringes. Consequently, fringes have a big advantage over cash wages. As taxation has become heavier and heavier, fringes have become more and more important in the total package offered by employers to workers; fringes were only 1.2 percent of total compensation in 1929, when income taxes were unimportant, as opposed to 16.4 percent in 1983. The explosion of fringes is strictly an artifact of taxation, and fringes are an economically inefficient way to pay people. Were the tax system neutral, taxing fringes at the same rate as cash wages, people would rather take their income in cash and make their own decisions about health and life insurance, country club dues, exercise facilities, and all the other things they now get from their employers without much choice. Futhermore, failing to tax fringes means taxes on other types of income are all the higher. Bringing all types of income under the tax system is essential for low rates.

INVESTMENT INCENTIVES

The high tax rates of the current tax system significantly impede capital formation. On this point, almost everyone agrees. The Government's solution to the problem has been to pile one special incentive on another, creating a complex and unworkable maze of regulations and tax forms. Existing investment incentives are appallingly uneven in their effect. Capital projects taking full advantage of accelerated depreciation, the investment tax credit, and the deductibility of interest are actually subsidized by the Government, not taxed at all. But equity-financed projects not eligible for fast depreciation are taxed heavily. Investment incentives severely distort the flow of capital into the most favored areas.

I propose to start over by throwing away all of the present incentives and replacing them with a simple, uniform principle—the total amount of investment will be treated as an expense in the year it is made. The first virtue of this reform is simplicity. The business and the Government need not quarrel, as they do now, over what is an investment and what is a current expense. The distinction doesn't matter for the tax. Complicated depreciation calculations, carrying over from 1 year to the next and driving the small business owner to distraction, and the cost of professional tax assistance, will vanish from the tax form. The even more complicated provisions for recapturing depreciation when a piece of equipment or a building is sold will vanish as well, to everyone's relief. All the complexities of the investment credit—what investments are eligible, whether the project lasts long enough to earn the full credit, what fraction of a plant is actually equipment and therefore receives the credit, and the recapture of the credit when an asset is sold—will disappear along with the credit.

Expensing of investment has a much deeper rationale than simplicity. Every act of investment in the economy ultimately traces back to an act of saving. Exempting investment from taxation is the same thing as exempting saving. A tax on income with an exemption for saving is in effect a tax on consumption, for consumption is the difference between income and saving. Consumption is what people take out of the economy; income is what people contribute to the economy. A consumption tax is the exact embodiment of the principle that people should be taxed on what they take out, not what they put in. The simple tax, with expensing of investment, is precisely a consumption tax.

Expensing investment eliminates the double taxation of saving; this is another way to express the most economically significant feature of expensing. Under an income tax, people pay tax once when they earn and save and again when the savings earn a return. With expensing, the first tax is abolished. Saving is, in effect, deducted in computing the tax. Later, the return to the saving is taxed through the business tax. Although economists have dreamt up a number of other ways to eliminate double taxation of saving (most involving complicated recordkeeping and reporting by individuals), the technique exploited in the simple tax is by far the most straightforward.

CAPITAL GAINS

Capital gains on rental property, plant, and equipment would be taxed under the business tax. The purchase price would be deducted at the time of purchase, and the sale price would be taxed at the time of the sale. Every owner of rental real estate would be required to fill out the simple business tax return.

Capital gains in the overall value of a successful firm will also be taxed under the new business tax and should not be taxed again at the household level. To see this point, consider the case of the common stock of a corporation. The value of its stock in the market is the capitalization of its future earnings. Because the owners of the stock will receive their earnings after the corporation has paid the business tax, that tax will depress the stock's market value. When the market learns that future earnings are likely to be higher than previously thought, the stock will rise in value and its owners will receive capital gains. When the high earnings materialize in the future, they will be correspondingly taxed. To tax the immediate capital gains of business income at the source, capital gains should be excluded from taxation at the household level.

Another way to see that capital gains should not be taxed separately under the flat tax is to look at the national income accounts. Gross national product, the most comprehensive measure of the Nation's command over resources, does not include capital gains. The base of the flat tax is GNP minus investment and Government, that is, consumption. To include capital gains in the flat-tax base would depart from the principle that it is a tax on consumption.

INTEREST DEDUCTIONS

Loss of interest deductions and elimination of interest taxation are two of the most conspicuous features of the tax reform. The bill calls for the parallel removal of interest deduction and interest taxation. If a transitional measure allows the continuation of deductions for interest on outstanding debt, it should also require the continuation of taxation of that interest as income of the lender. If all deductions are completely matched with taxation on the other side, then a transition provision to protect existing interest deductions would have no effect on revenue. In that respect, interest deductions are easier to handle in the transition than are depreciation deductions.

I propose a transitional measure preserving the interest deduction. Any borrower may choose to treat interest payments as a tax deduction. If the borrower so chooses, the lender must treat the interest as taxable income. But the borrower's deduction should be only 90 percent of his actual interest payment during the year, while the lender's taxable income should include 100 percent of the interest receipts.

Under this transitional plan, borrowers would be protected for almost all of their existing deductions. Someone whose personal finances would become untenable if the mortgage-interest deduction were suddenly eliminated can surely get through with 90 percent of his earlier deduction.

STIMULUS TO GROWTH

The flat tax at a low, uniform rate of 19 percent will improve the performance of the U.S. economy. Improved incentive to work through increased take-home wages will stimulate work effort and raise total output. Rational investment incentives will raise the overall level of investment and channel it into the most productive areas. And sharply lower taxation of entrepreneurial effort will enhance this most critical input to the economy.

The great majority of economically active Americans would face improved incentives for productive effort under the simple tax. In 1981, married taxpayers had marginal rates under 18 percent only if their taxable income was less than $7,600. The majority of families in that year had marginal tax rates of 32 percent or higher, and just 16 percent had incomes so low or deductions so high that their marginal rates were below 18 percent. Even these figures understate the improvement in incentives, because many of the couples taxed at low rates are in school or are retired. Only 2 percent of total gross income was earned by couples taxed below 18 percent on the margin. Half of all gross income was taxed at marginal rates of 37 percent or higher. The net effect of equalizing marginal rates at 19 percent is a dramatic improvement of incentives for almost everyone who is economically active.

An excellent series of studies by MIT economist Jerry Hausman, published by the Brookings Institution and a number of professional journals, has measured the potential stimulus to work effort from tax reform. For a flat-rate plan quite similar to ours, Hausman projects an increase of about 8 percent in total hours of work in the U.S. economy.

The total annual output of goods and services in the U.S. economy would rise by about 6 percent, or almost $240 billion. That is nearly $1,010 per person.

CAPITAL FORMATION

Economists are far from agreement on the impact of tax reform on investment. As I stressed earlier, the existing system puts heavy tax rates on business income, even though the net revenue from the system is small. These rates seriously erode investment incentives. Generous but erratic investment provisions in the current law and lax enforcement of taxes on business income at the personal level, however, combine to limit the adverse impact. The current tax system subsidizes tax-shelter investments—leased equipment, railway boxcars, cable television, oil wells, and the like—while it taxes capital formation heavily if it takes the form of complete new plants. The result has been to sustain capital formation at reasonably high levels, especially since the 1982 recession, but to channel the investment into inefficient uses.

The flat tax has a single, uniform incentive for investment of all types—businesses would treat all purchases of capital equipment and buildings as expenses. Allowing immediate write-off of investment is considered the ideal investment incentive. A tax system that taxes all income evenly and allows expensing of investment is a tax on consumption. Alan Auerbach, Laurence Kotlikoff, and Jonathan Skinner, working at Harvard, Yale, and the University of Virginia, respectively, estimated that the use of a flat-rate consumption tax in place of an income tax would raise the ratio of capital stock to GNP from 3.0 to 4.4. Other economists are less optimistic that the correction of the double taxation of saving would provide the resources for this large an increase in investment. But all would agree that there would be some favorable effect on capital formation.

In terms of added GNP, the increase in the capital stock projected by Auerbach and his coworkers would translate into 12 percent more goods and services. Not all of this extra growth would occur within the 7-year span we are looking at. But, even allowing for only partial attainment in 7 years and for a possible overstatement in their work, it seems reasonable to predict a 2 to 4 percent increase in GNP on account of added capital formation within 7 years.

INCOME DISTRIBUTION AND FAIRNESS

The simple tax would not make everyone better off straightaway. Today, heavy taxation of successful salary earners yields quite a bit of revenue, pushing these people out of their most productive undertakings and diverting their attention to tax avoidance. Until a response to improved incentives takes place, it is an obvious mathematical law that lower taxes on some people will have to be made up by higher taxes on others. If tax reform were a zero-sum process, giving relief to some by raising taxes on others, it would be politically unlikely to occur.

Revitalization of the economy, with more income to divide between the big earners and the rest, is the point of tax reform. A flat tax, however, is designed to be fair from the start. It will insulate the poor from all taxation. It will dramatically limit the taxation of wages and salaries, especially among those who are most successful and productive. It will pay for these tax reductions by imposing on business income a sensible tax at a low rate, thus raising the amount of Federal revenue collected from businesses.

TAXES ON WAGES AND SALARIES

My comparative analysis starts by looking at a comparision of the current tax and the flat tax for families who have nothing but wage income; these comparisons are relevant for the great majority of Americans.

Here is a comparision of the taxes that would be paid under the current system and under the flat-tax system by a family of four in 1985. This family, like most, derives its income from earnings. It consists of two adults and two children. Only one of the adults works, and the family does not take a deduction for child-care expenses—in 1981, the average child-care deduction was only $12. The family takes itemized deductions equal to the average in its income category.

	Current tax	Flat tax
Earnings:
$5,000	0	0
$10,000	$258	0
$15,000	882	$456
$25,000	2,374	2,356
$35,000	4,355	4,256
$50,000	8,189	7,109
$80,000	17,574	12,806

The table shows that people at every level of earnings will pay less under the flat wage tax than under the current personal income tax.

The taxation of business income under the present system is completely unsatisfactory. In spite of the burdensome tax rates imposed on business income by the combination of the corporate and personal income taxes, the total amount of tax collected on business income is remarkably small. In 1983, revenue from the corporate income tax was only $44 billion. In addition, the tax paid on all nonwage income reported for the personal income tax was no more than $30 billion. Total revenue from business taxation was no more than $74 billion. By contrast, revenue from taxes on wages under the personal income tax was $260 billion. The average tax rate on business income was only 11 percent, compared to over 15 percent on wages. Wage earners pay much heavier average tax rates than do business owners.

The flat tax would correct this fundamental inequity. The average tax rate on wages would be a little under 12 percent—19 percent on the margin, but less on the average because of allowances. The average tax rate on business income would be exactly 19 percent. At 1983 levels, business tax revenue would rise from $74 billion under the present tax to $129 billion under the flat tax.

INTEREST RATES

The simple tax would pull down interest rates immediately. High interest rates today are sustained partly by the income-tax deduction for interest paid and the tax on interest earned. Much of the pain of high interest is ameliorated by the tax benefit, and part of the income from interest is taken away by the IRS. Borrowers tolerate high interest rates and lenders require them. The simple tax would permit no deduction for interest paid and put no tax on interest received. Interest payments throughout the economy will be flows of after-tax income, thanks to taxation of business income at the source.

With the simple tax, borrowers will no longer be so tolerant of interest payments, and lenders will no longer be concerned about taxes. The meeting of minds in the credit market, where borrowing equals lending, will inevitably occur at a lower interest rate. Potentially, the fall could be spectacular. Much borrowing comes from corporations and wealthy individuals, who face marginal tax rates of 46 and 50 percent. On the other hand, the wealthy, almost by definition, are the big lenders in the economy. If every lender and every borrower were in the 50-percent bracket, simple logic shows that a tax reform eliminating deduction and taxation of interest would cut interest rates in half—for example, from 16 to 8 percent. But the leakage problem in the United States is so great that the actual drop in interest would be far short of this huge potential. So much lending comes through the devices by which the well-to-do get their interest income under low tax rates that a drop of half would be impossible. Lenders taxed at low rates would be worse off if taxation were eliminated but interest rates fell by half. The meeting of the minds in an economy with lenders enjoying low marginal rates before reform would have to come at an interest rate well above half the prereform level. But the decline would be at least a fifth—say from 16 percent to 13 percent. Reform would bring a noticeable drop in interest rates.

HOUSING

Everyone who hears about the simple flat tax, with no deductions for interest, worries about its effect on the housing market. Won't the elimination of the deduction depress the prices of existing houses and impoverish the homeowner who can only afford a house because of its interest deductions? Our answer to all of these questions is no, but we freely concede that there is a significant issue here.

I don't argue that tax reform will stimulate the housing market. But we do feel that the potential effects on house prices are small—small enough to be lost in the ups and downs of a volatile market. Basically, reform has two effects—to reduce interest rates and related costs of funds (and so to stimulate housing and other asset markets) and to deny interest deductions (and so to depress housing). To a reasonable approximation, these influences will cancel each other out.

Transition proposal takes care of the problem of existing mortgages without compromising the principles of the flat tax or diminishing its revenue. Homeowners would have the right to continue deducting 90 percent of their mortgage interest. Recall that the bank would then be required to pay tax on the interest it received, even though interest on new mortgages would be untaxed. Homeowners could expect to receive attractive propositions from their banks to rewrite their mortgages at an interest rate about three percentage points lower, but without tax deductibility. Even if banks and homeowners could not get together to lower rates, the homeowners could still deduct 90 percent of what he deducted before.

CHARITABLE CONTRIBUTIONS

Deduction of contributions to worthy causes would be a thing of the past under our tax reform. Will the Nation stop supporting its churches, hospitals, museums, and opera companies when the tax deduction disappears? We think not. But we should also be clear that incentives matter—the current tax system with high marginal rates and tax deductions provides inappropriately high incentives for some contributions. The immediate effect of tax reform may be a small decline in giving. Later, as the economy surges forward under the impetus of improved incentives for productive activity, giving will recover and likely exceed its current levels.

Of this, only $36 billion was deducted on tax returns. The great bulk of contributions were not even affected by the law permitting deduction. We can confidently expect the continuation of the $97 billion in contributions being made today without any special tax benefits. Further, the bulk of contributions is made today by people in modest tax brackets—less than $14 billion in contributions were deducted in 1981 by families with taxable incomes over $35,000. In this connection, it is important to understand that well over half of all cash contributions go to churches, and these gifts are generally from the middle of the income distribution.

The major tax cut enacted in 1981—the Economic Recovery Tax Act—cut marginal tax rates from 70 percent to 50 percent for the highest incomes. As a result, major donors shifted from spending 30-cent dollars to spending 50-cent dollars for tax-deductible gifts. In spite of this major reduction in the incentive to give, donations to charity grew robustly. Here are the numbers:

[In billions of dollars]

Year	Tax deductions	Total gifts
1979	24	94
1980	28	111
1981	33	118
1982	36	133
1983	(1)	145

[1] Not available.

Thus, there is a sound basis for our projection that contributions will not decline when a further diminution of the tax incentive occurs.

LIFE IS A 19-PERCENT WORLD

What would life be like in a world with a 19-percent flat tax? The most important change in our behavior is that we would spend our time thinking about producing goods and services and improving productivity instead of remaining obsessed with getting advice on how to exploit tax-advantaged opportunities. With 50-percent top marginal rates, many high-income people feel that they cannot afford to reveal any significant income to the IRS. They put great effort into reducing taxable income by investing in tax shelters and diverting their incomes to tax-free destinations. Indeed, at 50 cents on the dollar, dishonesty is very lucrative. At 19 percent, most people would relax. Evasion and avoidance are far less profitable at 19 percent than at 50 percent. Conversely, keeping 81 cents of every additional dollar of income is a true stimulus to produce as much as possible. With taxes taking no more than 19 cents from each additional dollar at every income level, most people will pursue those economic activities that bring the highest return and the most satisfaction, rather than the ones that minimize taxable income.

Think of the everyday kinds of decisions most people make that are governed by a steeply graduated tax-rate structure. Reducing the Government's contribution to business lunches from 50 to 19 cents will restrict the spending of dining dollars to absolutely essential business activity. Tickets for box seats at baseball stadiums, club memberships, business travel, company cars, and a host of other business outlays that incorporated and unincorporated firms regularly purchase, would now cost the owners of that business 81 cents of after-tax income, rather than the current 50 cents. Business would be expected to run a tighter ship with the much higher returns that a 19-percent rate affords over current high rates.

At the level of the individual household, toward which so many tax shelters are directed, cutting the top rate from 50 to 19 percent will virtually make all shelters uneconomic. Combined with the loss of the current interest deduction, no investment decision would ever be governed by tax considerations.

Those who believe that life would grind to a halt with the loss of deductions for interest and charitable contributions, or that investors heavily leveraged into shelters would suffer enormous losses, need to consider how they would alter their lives the morning the flat tax took effect. They would fire their lawyers and accountants and tear up all of their tax-shelter brochures. Instead, they would seek advice and information on sound economic investments. A half million of the Nation's brightest people would change their professions into meaningful, productive work, away from selling tax advice and shelters. The Wall Street Journal would no longer carry ads touting oil, gas, cattle, energy, real estate, and other shelters. As real incomes rose, people's charitable propensities would keep pace—remember that most charitable giving today is after-tax dollars, not declared deductions.

Perhaps most important, for the ordinary working American, the 19-percent world would abolish the annual nightmare of tax-return preparation in April. Both forms 1 and 2 could be filled out in a few minutes on the basis of records that everyone keeps anyway.

SUMMARY

A good tax system is efficient, equitable, and simple. The progressive flat-rate tax allows investment and other resources to flow to where they yield the highest return, thus meeting the test of maximizing overall economic efficiency. Business decisions would be made on the basis of pretax returns, not tax considerations; nor would any system of graduated rates penalize overtime, marriage, second jobs, thrift, or risk-taking. The Hall-Rabushka plan eliminates double taxation, abolishes the capital gains tax, and replaces the complex depreciation schedules with 100 percent write off of all investment spending in the year it occurs. It is, thus, a tax on consumption, providing maximum encouragement to investment and savings, the foundation of economic growth. Everyone would get to keep 81 cents of each additional dollar, however few or many. In the same vein, the Hall-Rabushka plan meets the test of efficient revenue collection. Taxpayers would minimize their preparation time and costs, and the Treasury would finally get a handle on tax shelters and the growing incidence of evasion.

By Mr. KASTEN:

S. 322. A bill to amend title XVIII of the Social Security Act to revise the requirements relating to nursing care provided by certain hospice programs through arrangements with other medicare certified providers; to the Committee on Finance.

NURSING CARE PROVIDED BY CERTAIN HOSPICE PROGRAMS

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation which will allow more hospices to subcontract for nursing services and participate in the Medicare program.

As most of my colleagues are aware, Congress adopted Medicare coverage of hospice services in TEFRA. As a result, terminally ill Medicare patients now have the opportunity to live most of their last months in the home with necessary medical support services.

Unfortunately, Mr. President, in our effort to prevent abuse of the new benefit and to ensure quality care, we created a situation that makes it very difficult, if not impossible, for hospices to serve Medicare patients. Specifically, Congress required that a hospice must routinely provide substantially all of four specific core services, including nursing, medical, social, physician, and counseling services, to qualify for Medicare coverage. We have provided coverage for a service many people will never benefit from—not because they are ineligible, but because too few hospices will be able to meet the criteria the law mandates. In effect, we have rendered the hospice benefit virtually nonexistent in many areas.

First, the requirements pose severe problems in rural and underserved areas where medical resources are lacking. Limited manpower and limited capital make subcontracting vital to the existence of hospices in these areas.

Second, many small- and middle-sized hospices, regardless of location, simply cannot afford the labor and administrative costs of directly hiring the necessary professionals.

Third, many hospital-based hospices now provide the home care component of their service through certified home health agencies. Without the flexibility of subcontracting, many hospitals may forgo a hospice program or create new home health programs of their own, in areas where more than enough already exist. This is simply not cost effective.

Mr. President, hospices were built around a coalition model which draws on many community resources. They bring together hospitals, physicians, home health agencies, medical social workers, counselors, and volunteers to care and comfort the terminally ill. The current core services requirement directly undermines the concept of hospices and causes unnecessary duplication of services.

It is important to note that more than half of the hospital-based hospices studied in the Federal hospice demonstration program contract out for services. Many freestanding hospices continue to contract out as well. While many hospices do exist in spite of the strict regulations, they forfeit Medicare certification. As an original cosponsor of legislation providing Medicare coverage of hospice benefits, I believe we must act to ensure that Medicare benefits are provided as Congress intended.

Last year, we did make some headway in relaxing the core service requirements. Under provisions of the Deficit Reduction Act, the Secretary of Health and Human Services may now waive the nursing care core service requirements for hospices located in rural areas, provided that the hospice was in operation on or before January 1, 1983, and that it made a good-faith effort to hire its own nurses.

Despite this progress, there are still many hospices that will not be able to meet the onerous requirements for Medicare coverage.

The legislation I have introduced will allow hospices in rural areas and health manpower shortage areas to contract out for nursing services. This bill also will allow hospices certified and in existence before January 1, 1985, to benefit from contracting out. To ensure quality care, the bill also adds a new requirement that the subcontractees be Medicare certified, licensed, or State certified before January 1, 1985—if the applicable State has such a law.

Mr. President, I believe that this legislation will provide the flexibility necessary for the effective operation of hospice services while it upholds the standards of care. I ask that my colleagues join me in this effort to help make hospice care a viable option for all those in need.

S. 325. A bill to reduce tax rates in a manner that is fair to all taxpayers, and to simplify the tax laws by eliminating most credits, deductions, and exclusions; to the Committee on Finance.

FAIR AND SIMPLE TAX ACT

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I am very pleased to reintroduce the Fair and Simple Tax Act. This bill—with minor changes—is the same as the bill Congressman JACK KEMP and I introduced last year.

Our plan—which provides the American taxpayers with a better system—

calls for a broadened tax base, a single low-tax rate, and the essential deductions that most itemizing taxpayers take.

Our counterparts in the tax reform movement—Senator BRADLEY and Congressman GEPHARDT—are also reintroducing their legislation today. Mr. President, this is a very important event, because it shows that the bipartisan spirit of tax reform is very much alive in the U.S. Congress.

And, as almost everyone knows, the administration has also come up with a plan for tax reform, and I think it is safe to say that the prospect for some kind of tripartisan tax reform measure is very likely this session.

Like my colleagues, I am excited about this, because it's about time the American people got a break from the maze of tax laws, regulations, and interpretations of those laws and regulations. Did you know, for example: That nearly 36 million—or 40 percent—American taxpayers seek professional help when filing their tax returns? That there are over 5,105 pages in the Internal Revenue Code, and about 10,000 pages of IRS interpretations of that code? This has got to stop.

The American people deserve a break from a Tax Code that's nothing more than a maze of complexity. The Kemp-Kasten Fair and Simple Tax does just that.

FAST is fair in the sense that everyone will pay the same rate of tax. Under today's tax system, two people—or businesses—can pay very different rates—and amounts—of tax. This depends on the source of the income, as well as the opportunities to take advantages of preferences in the Tax Code.

The tax system also needs to be simple. In our bill, we make the tax rules simple. Currently there are different rules for different people. People earning wage and salary income are treated differently from those earning investment income. What we need is a common set of rules so that everyone understands the rules of the game.

Mr. President, when there are two or three proposals based on a similar concept—like tax reform—it's very easy to focus on the differences between them. It's very true that there are differences between the three leading tax reform proposals, but there are also many more similarities. And, the similarities are far more important than the differences.

All three bills lower marginal tax rates in an effort to provide incentives for work, saving, and investment, and, to provide a disincentive for tax avoidance. The plans also broaden the tax base, so that they will be revenue neutral.

Under the current tax system, Congress continually passes laws which, in one way or another exclude large amounts of income from the tax base. This is done in order to provide tax relief for specific interest groups, but the result is to force higher tax rates on everyone else just for the Treasury to break even. And, as tax rates rise, so does the incentive to avoid paying taxes—through deductions, credits and exclusions and blatant evasion. Tax reform will put a stop to this.

All three bills are concerned with protecting lower income Americans from taxation. Under current tax law, the average family of four begins paying tax on $8,936 of income. This is far below the official U.S. poverty level of $11,000. Under all three plans the tax threshold is above the poverty level, although FAST is the most generous with the tax threshold at $14,375.

All three bills provide a simpler tax system.

All three bills are revenue neutral—at least in the first year. And, all three bills are designed to be revenue neutral by income distribution. In other words, no taxpayer will pay more to the Treasury than they do now.

Tax reform is not an excuse for a tax increase. The Republican platform makes this clear—and so do the leading tax reform proposals.

Unlike the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984 and the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982, this next tax bill won't call for revenue enhancement. It won't take away important deductions, exclusions, and credits, and give taxpayers nothing in return.

The point of this year's exercise is to broaden the tax base in order to provide lower tax rates. The benefits from tax reform are significant. It provides American businesses with a "level playing field" for investment decisions and incentives for saving, investment, risk taking, and economic growth. As the economy grows—both businesses and jobs—more revenue will flow into the Treasury.

Mr. President, the most important thing about tax reform in the short run, most people—business and individuals—have something to gain from tax reform. In the long run, everyone gains a great deal from it. The trick is to get people to look beyond the loss of a particular deduction, exclusion, or credit, and to instead focus on the total effect of tax reform.

Mr. President, the fair and simple tax plan is a change for the better. The plan offers the best features of a flat tax system—a simple low tax rate applied to all taxpayers—with special provisions for wageearners, families with children, savers, and homeowners. For the benefit of my colleagues, I would like to offer a brief description of the plan.

THE KEMP-KASTEN "FAIR AND SIMPLE TAX" [FAST]

GENERAL DESCRIPTION

After deducting generous personal allowances and employment income exclusion, all taxable income is taxed at a reduced rate of 24%:

Kemp-Kasten eliminates most deductions, credits, exemptions, exclusions except:

Personal allowances:

Personal exemption doubled to $2,000 for each taxpayer, spouse, and dependent below age 19.

Extra $2,000 exemption for elderly, blind and disabled.

Zero-bracket amounts (standard deduction) of $2,600 single, $2,700 head of household, $3,300 joint.

Indexes for inflation the personal exemption, zero-bracket amounts, earned income credit.

New exclusion for earned and unearned income:

Excludes 20% of gross wage, salary, and self-employment income up to Social Security wage base ($41,700 in 1986, and indexed by law); phased out to result in a maximum effective marginal tax rate of about 28%.

For those with employment income of less than $10,000 (single) or $15,000 (joint return), excludes 20% of any income from taxation, regardless of its source, up to those amounts; this is designed to protect those who live mostly from saving and pension income rather than wages.

Retains deductions for:

Charitable contributions.

Interest on mortgages and loans for education and investments.

Real property taxes.

Medical expenses above 10% of adjusted gross income.

Treatment of capital gains and losses:

Taxpayers may choose between full taxation of gains, with basis indexed for inflation from date of enactment, or excluding 40% of gains and losses (17% top rate) without indexing.

Current homeowner's rollover and one-time exclusion is retained.

Six-month holding period made permanent.

Retains current treatment of:

Retirement annuities (IRAs, Keoghs [H.R. 10], Social Security [improved treatment], corporate pensions); military and veterans benefits; employer-provided benefits (such as health, life insurance premiums); foreign source income; earned income credit (slightly modified); general obligation tax-exempt bonds; employee business expenses and moving expenses; ordinary business expenses.

Corporate income tax:

Reduced rate of 35% applied to the following tax base:

Kemp-Kasten eliminates most deductions, credits, exemptions, exclusions except:

Deductions listed above, if applicable, e.g., charitable contributions.

Ordinary business expenses.

Capital gains treatment: either full taxation with indexing, or a reduced 20% rate without indexing.

Foreign income tax credit.

Small business provisions:

15% tax rate up to $50,000 taxable income; 25% rate for $50,000 to $100,000 taxable income.

Expensing for up to $10,000 of business property.

Neutral Cost Recovery System (NCRS): current-law capital cost recovery schedules are modified to provide the economic equivalent of expensing, and indexed for inflation.

Mr. President, since the fair and simple tax plan was introduced last April, there have been many questions about it. Here are the top nine questions most often asked—with answers.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS ON THE KEMP-KASTEN "FAIR AND SIMPLE TAX"

1. What deductions are allowed under the Kemp-Kasten plan?

Individuals can deduct interest on loans for residential property (including mortgage interest) and education costs, charitable contributions, real property taxes, investment interest expenses, and catastrophic medical expenses.

2. How does the employment income exclusion work?

If you earn up to the Social Security wage base ($41,700 in 1986), you may exclude 20% of your salary from taxes, for a maximum exclusion of $8,340 in 1986. Two-earner couples with combined incomes in excess of the wage base may figure their exclusions separately and add the two.

Taxpayers with less than $10,000 (single) or $15,000 (joint return) in wages may exclude 20% of income from any source, up to those amounts, for a maximum exclusion of $2,000 (single) or $3,000 (joint return). This especially helps retirees who are living primarily on pensions or savings.

If you earn more than $41,700, 20% of your gross income over $41,700 is added back. To figure the net exclusion on an income over the wage base, multiply the excess of your income over $41,700 by 20%, and subtract that dollar figure from your maximum exclusion of $8,340. For 1986, this results in a zero exclusion for incomes over $83,400.

3. Are there any proposed changes that specifically benefit older Americans?

Individuals over age 65 may take an extra personal exemption (for a total personal exemption of $4,000). As mentioned above, all retirees will benefit from the employment income exclusion.

Social Security recipients will benefit from several changes. The retirement test, which reduces benefits by 50 cents for every $1 earned above $7,320 in 1985, is gradually phased out. The benefit reduction is immediately cut from 50 cents to 25 cents on a dollar.

The bill also reduces the taxation of Social Security benefits for most recipients, by reducing the taxable amount.

4. How are municipal bonds treated under the Kemp-Kasten plan?

The bill "grandfathers" current municipal bonds so if you presently receive tax-exempt interest income from a bond, it would remain tax-exempt. For bonds issued after the bill's enactment, interest on general obligation bonds would remain tax-exempt. Interest from future private-purpose bonds (such as industrial development bonds and mortgage revenue bonds) would become taxable.

5. How does Kemp-kasten treat capital gains?

Taxpayers could choose between two options. (1) Capital gains would be treated as ordinary income, with the basis indexed for inflation so investors are only taxed on real gains. The current holding period is eliminated. (2) Investors could exclude 40% of gains (for a top 17% effective rate), with no indexing, and subject to the six-month holding period.

The bill retains the current homeowner's rollover and the one-time exclusion of capital gains on the sale of a home by a taxpayer over age 55.

6. Does Kemp-Kasten change the status of employer-provided benefits, such as health and life insurance?

No! Employees would not be taxed on contributions made by their employers for important benefits, such as health and life insurance, pension plans, and educational assistance.

7. Does Kemp-Kasten retain indexing so that taxpayers are protected from inflation?

Yes! The bill indexes for inflation the personal exemption, the standard deduction, the 20% employment income exclusion, the earned income credit, capital gains, and depreciation allowances.

8. How does Kemp-Kasten treat business expenses?

Business expenses are deductible to the same extent as under current law. This includes employee business expenses (such as union dues or professional fees), ordinary business expenses, interest expenses, and moving expenses.

9. Does Kemp-Kasten change the current depreciation schedules?

Yes. The bill modifies the current capital cost recovery system to provide the economic equivalent of expensing, and the system is indexed for inflation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. BINGAMAN (for himself, Mr. HOLLINGS, and Mr. PRYOR):

S. 326. A bill to amend the Public Works and Economic Development Act of 1965 to authorize appropriations for additional fiscal years; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

PUBLIC WORKS AND ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT ACT APPROPRIATION AUTHORIZATION

● Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President today I am introducing legislation to reauthorize the Economic Development Administration [EDA]. The bill is a simple reauthorization for an additional 2 years, through fiscal years 1985, 1986, and 1987. The bill makes no substantive changes in the program.

Since 1965, when EDA was first authorized as a successor to the Area Development Administration, it has provided an invaluable service to many of the neediest communities in each of the 50 States.

EDA's mission has been to generate new jobs and help protect existing jobs in economically distressed areas of the Nation. The Agency has administered a variety of successful programs which have increased personal incomes of individuals and enriched communities in distressed areas by providing the support necessary to create long-term jobs and lasting growth in the private sector. The program includes grants and loans for public works, business loans, and loan guarantees; and planning and technical assistance. In addition, grants are made to continue programs of economic development planning for States, cities, multicounty development districts, cooperating jurisdictions, and Indian tribes and councils. The services provided have improved the communities and lives of millions of Americans. It has helped needy communities to build roads, sewers, industrial parks, and much more.

EDA has had a tremendous impact on our States and communities. In my own State of New Mexico, countless numbers of individuals have been helped through EDA's grants. Over the past several years, EDA funding for New Mexico has exceeded $165,831,000, which was spent on some 585 different projects. EDA has been especially important to Indian tribes which have depended heavily upon EDA funding for many of their programs. Some 265 New Mexican Indian projects have received EDA funding over the past 3 years. These projects have ranged from the construction of tribal office buildings to the completion of irrigation improvement projects.

In spite of its success and flexibility the EDA has operated without congressional authorization since 1982. EDA appropriations have fallen from $668 million in fiscal year 1981 to $228 million for fiscal year 1986. While I am not proposing an increase in funding, it is time for us to once again affirm our support for the important time-tested EDA programs which have proven themselves to be of great value for nearly 20 years in all parts of this Nation. Reauthorization of the Agency is a reaffirmation of EDA's successful past. It is not a call for any new expenditure of funds, it would simply authorize the existence of the Agency.

A simple extension is not without precedent. Such was done in December 1980, when Congress reauthorized EDA for 2 years through fiscal year 1982. Congress at that time passed simple extension for 2 years, just as my bill calls for.

The future of the EDA is imperiled. I joined five of my colleagues earlier this month in introducing a resolution calling on the President to reconsider his intention to dismantle the EDA in 1986 and to restore EDA's obligated funding for 1985. This funding was impounded by the administration on January 8 of this year. The Senate must reaffirm its support for this important program.

I hope my colleagues will join me in calling for swift congressional approval of this bill.●

By Mr. MATHIAS (for himself and Mr. SARBANES):

S. 327. A bill to amend title 23, United States Code, to provide more flexibility in allocation of interstate substitute funds; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

ALLOCATION OF INTERSTATE SUBSTITUTE FUNDS

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I am delighted to introduce legislation that would enable the State of Maryland to complete construction on the remaining 18-mile gap in the National Freeway from Hancock to Cumberland in western Maryland.

The idea of building an interstate highway to cut through the Appalachian Mountains and link the networks of highways on either side of the peaks was conceived in the early 1970's. The new highway, now only partly built, is already an important route for shippers seeking the shortest and least costly route to consumers in the Midwest. The completion of this freeway would also be a significant shot in the arm for the ailing economy of the Appalachian region and a boon for the city of Baltimore, where there would be an infusion of business at the Port of Baltimore.

Since its conception, however, the effort to get the National Freeway built has been filled with frustrations. After a string of legal and financial barriers, the State of Maryland is eager to get the project underway. Recognizing the limited availability of Federal funds under the Appalachian Regional Commission Program, the State has decided to move forward with the project on its own and has developed a creative package to finance it. Officials from the State and the Baltimore area have agreed to divert funds from transportation projects in the city of Baltimore to the National Freeway.

In order to consummate that agreement, however, legislation is needed to revise the Interstate Substitution Concept Program. In establishing that program, the Congress set a deadline of September 30, 1983, for States to submit lists of transportation projects to which they planned to transfer Federal funds. Since Maryland officials at that time were still counting on direct Federal assistance for the freeway under the Appalachian Regional Commission Program, they did not include the project on their list of transfer projects.

Now that they have decided to put aside other federally-funded transportation projects in Baltimore in order to pay for completion of the National Freeway, they need to revise their list to include the freeway project. The legislation which I submit today would extend the deadline in the original law from September 30, 1983, to September 30, 1986, enabling Maryland to add the freeway to its list of substitution projects.

In addition to that small change in the Substitution Program law, one clarification is required. The Substitutional Program requires that all projects involved in a transfer of funds serve the same geographical area. The intent of that provision was to ensure that funds would not be grabbed from a region against the will of its people.

The National Freeway's service to the Baltimore area should be evident, given the favorable impact it will have on the area's economy and the Port of Baltimore. The fact that the mayor of the city, William Donald Schaefer, and the Baltimore county executive, Donald Hutchinson, have both agreed to this transfer is also telling. While it is clear to Marylanders that this project serves the same geographical area, this legislation will make that fact explicitly clear. It will do so by recognizing that if all parties agree to a transfer, it must be mutually beneficial and therefore serves the same geographical area.

The people who will benefit from the completion of the National Freeway are diverse. They are not only the miners and builders of western Maryland, but include also the dockworkers of Baltimore, the farmers of the Ohio Valley, and shippers and consumers throughout the East and the Midwest. I hope that my colleagues will find it possible to support this cost-free legislation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 327

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That paragraph 4 of section 103(e) of title 23, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by striking out "which will serve the area or areas from which the interstate route or portion thereof was withdrawn" in the second sentence,

(2) by striking out "area or areas to be served" in the second sentence and inserting in lieu thereof "area from which the interstate route, or portion thereof, was withdrawn", and

(3) by striking out the third sentences and inserting in lieu thereof the following new sentences: "The Secretary shall not approve any withdrawal of a route under this paragraph after September 30, 1983, except that the Secretary may approve withdrawals until September 30, 1986, on any route which on, May 12, 1982, was under a judicial injunction prohibiting the construction of such route. The Secretary may approve a substitute project under this paragraph after September 30, 1983 (or September 30, 1985, in the case of any route which was under a judicial injunction on May 12, 1982 prohibiting the construction of such route) only if the approval of such substitute project does not alter the aggregate amount of funds to which any State is entitled under this paragraph. The two preceding sentences shall not apply with respect to any route that, on November 6, 1978, was under a judicial injunction prohibiting the construction of such route.";

(4) by inserting after the eighteenth sentence (as redesignated by reason of paragraph (3) of this section) the following new sentences: "In September of each year, the Secretary shall adjust the last cost estimate submitted to reflect (1) changes in the amounts available to the Secretary under this paragraph, (2) changes in State estimates of the division of funds between substitute highway and transit projects, and (3) the allocation and apportionment of substitute highway funds in prior fiscal years. The Secretary shall use the Federal share of such adjusted estimate in making apportionments for substitute highway projects on October 1 of the year of adjustment if the Congress has not approved an interstate substitute cost estimate to make such apportionment."; and

(5) by inserting after the twenty-sixth sentence (as redesignated by reason of paragraphs (3) and (4) of this section) the following new sentence: "In September of each year, the Secretary shall adjust the last cost estimate submitted to reflect (1) changes in the amounts available to the Secretary under this paragraph, (2) changes in State estimates of the division of funds between substitute highway and transit projects, and (3) the allocation and apportionment of substitute transit funds in prior fiscal years. The Secretary shall use the Federal share of such adjusted estimate in making apportionments for substitute transit projects on October 1 of the year of adjustment if the Congress has not approved an interstate substitute cost estimate to make such apportionment.".

By Mr. HECHT (for himself, Mr. LAXALT, Mr. NICKLES, and Mr. SYMMS):

S. 329. A bill entitled the "Highway Speed Modification Act of 1985"; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

HIGHWAY SPEED MODIFICATION ACT

Mr. HECHT. Mr. President, over 10 years ago, the United States experienced one of the most threatening and economically devastating situations ever witnessed by this country, that being the Arab oil embargo of the early 1970's. Drastic upheaval in American lifestyles transpired and for the first time in modern-day America, the abundance and convenience of life, which we all were used to, was severely restricted. As we watched energy prices increase fourfold, conservation became our initial goal with the most visible action being the lowering of speed limits on our roads and highways to 55 miles per hour. Enacted as a temporary provision in 1973, Congress made the law permanent in 1974 and it has stood ever since.

As we all know, Mr. President, the situation is much different today. The American people responded to the oil embargo in a strong and resourceful fashion. Advanced technology has made our cars more fuel efficient, strict conservation was adhered to, and new ways were found to develop alternative energy sources. In the past few years, a renewed and strengthened American economy has created an environment where energy supplies are abundant, oil prices continue to decline, and the adverse effects of the embargo are all but forgotten.

Mr. President, as the memories of the oil embargo have faded, there is now great concern in many sectors of society over whether or not the original 55-mile-per-hour law is as effective and useful as it once was. A recently published report of the National Research Council clearly raised questions about the 55-mile-per-hour law and has cast doubt on the law's future. Generally approving the benefits of the 55-mile-per-hour limit, the National Research Council report acknowledges that while the law has been beneficial in reducing fuel consumption and traffic fatalities, in certain circumstances, speed limits might justifiably be allowed to be raised. Moreover, Mr. President, in the past few years, compliance with the 55-mile-per-hour law has dramatically decreased and States appear to have lost interest in enforcing the law, even with the threat of possibly losing Federal highway construction dollars.

The National Research Council report states that "as with many other policies that attempt to modify public behavior, the benefits of the 55-mile-per-hour speed limit diminished along with public awareness and compliance with the law." Indeed, Mr. President, compliance has decreased dramatically and it is now estimated that over 75 percent of all drivers today exceed the 55-mile-per-hour limit. While compliance diminishes, an interesting fact reflects the gains in highway safety made over the years; as the national average speed continues to increase, the national highway fatality figure continues to decrease.

The inadequacies of the current 55-mile-per-hour speed limit and the trend away from compliance have moved me to introduce today legislation that will modify the 1974 speed limit law. I want to assure my colleagues that this bill is in no way intended to repeal the law, for I believe, as the National Research Council indicates, that in certain circumstances, the 55-mile-per-hour speed limit is justified. On the other hand, for rural areas and on highways originally constructed to be traveled at higher speeds, some alteration in the law should be made. Basically, my law would do the following:

Allow each State to raise speed limits as high as 65 miles per hour on roads outside urban areas. Urban areas will be defined as communities with a population of 50,000 people or more.

It would give the States the right to determine which roads, outside urban areas, are suitable for higher speeds and it would hold speed limits within urban areas at the current 55 miles per hour.

Mr. President, America prospers today because of an administration that strives for less government and more self-determination by individuals and States. The bill I am introducing is a further step in that direction. It is a realistic and balanced approach, one that recognizes the benefits and problems of the 55-mile-per-hour speed limit while attempting to offer a rational and workable solution.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. BURDICK:

S. 337. A bill to terminate the effect of provisions of the Voting Rights Act of 1963 that require bilingual ballots and election materials; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

VOTER PARTICIPATION

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to terminate the effect of provisions of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 that require bilingual ballots and election materials. I want to emphasize that this bill would not prohibit States and localities from printing bilingual or multilingual ballots. Rather, the Federal Government would no longer require such ballots and materials.

One of the major problems resulting from bilingual ballots is cost. In the general election of 1980, the counties of the State of California spent $862,756 on bilingual ballots, with costs reaching more than $50 per bilingual ballot request in many counties. While the cost of English ballots is usually less than $2 per registered voter, non-English ballots range from $6 upward. In one case, a county spent $6,619 producing foreign language ballots and not a single one was used. The General Accounting Office is doing a study of the costs incurred by States and localities under the bilingual ballot provisions for the election last November. The results are not yet available, but I look forward to receiving them so that we can get a better view of the tremendous expense the Federal Government is forcing on State and local governments by this ill-advised policy.

A second and more important problem is that bilingual ballots do not encourage non-English speakers to learn English. While I applaud one's ability to speak foreign languages, I think it is absolutely essential that citizens of the United States speak English. It is important for unity. It is important for stability. In essence, it is important for the future of this country. Any mechanism—and the bilingual ballot is one—that encourages one not to learn English is dangerous for American society. It is counterproductive to achieving and maintaining a common language. A common language is a goal for which we, as leaders of this country, should all strive.

I want to emphasize that the effect of a single language ballot would not be the disfranchisement of voters. Rather, the single language ballot is an attempt to bring non-English speaking citizens full force into the system. English is the language of politics and public debate. In order to cast informed votes, and in fact, in order to have an effective impact on public policy as a voter, candidate, or elected official, one must speak English.

In addition, efforts which would allow non-English speaking citizens to get along in this society are themselves disfranchising. In fact, bilingual ballots promote exactly that. The supposed beneficiaries can get along with bilingual ballots, but they do not become full participants in the process. In the long run, the result is much more damaging than the short-term price of forcing, if you will, everyone to know English.

Finally, let us look to the States and localities themselves for guidance on this issue. In 1983, the citizens of San Francisco qualified and passed by 63 percent an initiative in favor of English-only ballots. Then, the citizens of California took the issue a step further in a statewide referendum. Last November, these citizens advised the Federal Government of their preference for English-only ballots by approving the referendum 71 percent to 29 percent. Furthermore, five States have declared English their official language and more are expected to follow.

We would do well to listen to these people and let them know that if they want to have bilingual ballots, so be it. But we are not going to force this misguided policy on them.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 337

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That no provision of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 (42 U.S.C. 1973 et seq.) that requires ballots or other materials relating to the electoral process to be made available in a language other than English shall apply with respect to any election taking place on or after the date of the enactment of this Act.

By Mr. RIEGLE:

S. 338. A bill to provide for the investigation of consumer complaints regarding interstate telephone toll service, to require companies offering interstate telephone toll service to notify consumers of changes in rates and charges, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

INTERSTATE TELECOMMUNICATIONS CONSUMER PROTECTION ACT

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, between now and the end of the year some 40 million Americans will have been afforded the opportunity to choose among alternative long-distance telephone companies which will be offering them essentially similar types of services. And between now and the end of 1986 roughly 70 percent of all Americans owning 183 million telephones connected to 111 million telephone lines will be able to pick up their phone, dial the number "1," and place a long-distance call over the long-distance carrier of their choice. Currently, customers using long-distance carriers other than AT&T must dial a lengthy access code before placing a long-distance call.

This process of providing "equal access" to competitors of AT&T—such as MCI, GTE/Sprint, SBS/Skyline, Allnet, U.S. Tel, and MAX Long Distance Phone Service—is one result of the breakup of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., which was agreed to by the Justice Department and AT&T. This process of equal access is proving to be confusing, however. It is time-consuming and disconcerting to many Americans as they try to make an intelligent choice of a long-distance telephone company.

Headlines indicate that consumers all across the country are baffled by a barrage of alternatives which they do not understand and which often make little sense when compared one to another. A sample of newspaper headlines from a cross section of publications tell the story. Here are a couple: "Bewildering Changes Coming for Phone Users"; "Long-Distance War Baffling to Customers"; "Need Telephone Service? Dial 'C' for Confusion"; "Long Distance Phone-Battle: Rivals Seek Equal Access Customers"; "Long Distance Rivals Take Off the Gloves"; "A Marketing Blitz Is in Progress"; "Behind the Chaos in Phone Service."

The Washington Post has reported: "As AT&T competitors gear up for this election on the part of the public, they are expanding sales forces, running ads, and soliciting customers through direct mail, personal presentations, and telemarketing. In some instances, the companies themselves are confused."

Last October I wrote a letter to the Chairman of the Federal Communications Commission, which was signed by 16 other Senators, requesting that the FCC devise a standard, uniform, long-distance disclosure form for the benefit of consumers. Our letter expresses the concern that this administration owes the public a duty to minimize the confusion in long-distance service being offered.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the letter be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, DC, October 10, 1984.

Chairman MARK S. FOWLER,
Federal Communications Commission,
Washington, DC.

DEAR CHAIRMAN FOWLER: In order to afford the consumer a certain measure of comparable information upon which to base an educated choice of a long distance telephone company, especially during this critical three-year period when equal access is being phased-in, we believe that the Federal Communications Commission should develop a standard disclosure form which each long distance telephone company that qualifies for equal access be required to complete, and have this sent to each potential customer.

The result of "equal access," which is supposed to promote full and fair competition in the long distance telephone industry, as well as provide consumers with the cheapest, most efficient service possible, is that the consumer is now being thrust into an arena of decision-making without basic, adequate, comparative information.

Even professional, full-time consumer groups are finding it exceedingly difficult to get correct information to some very basic questions such as: "From how many cities does your company offer service?" "Do you have a monthly service fee?" "Is there a minimum monthly bill?" "What credit card features does your company offer?"

These are all questions one might ask when comparing services and features of different long distance companies. But when researchers from the Telecommunications Research and Action Center (TRAC), a non-profit, consumer group based in Washington, D.C., called the long distance companies recently to get answers to those and similar questions, they found that it is not the least bit easy to get a correct answer. TRAC researchers found that repeated calls to a company's toll free information number often resulted in different answers to the same question.

The result is that consumers are forced to compare apples and oranges, and their choices are subsequently made without sufficient and adequate comparative information and sometimes for illogical reasons.

A basic form might, for example, require long distance companies to indicate their basic rates (day, evening, and late night/weekend) for a call from the potential caller's residence to certain present distances. In this way, consumers would be better able to compare the same set of basic rates and would be able to contact the particular company if they desired more specific information. The form might also indicate what cities or sections of the country the company serves, if there are additional charges for calls to non/metropolitan areas, what the billing structure is, and the extent of the service offered (i.e., intra-state, international services, travel features, etc.).

Similar standard disclosure requirements have already been adopted in other areas to promote better consumer knowledge of products and services. This list includes, but is not limited to, truth-in-lending laws for consumer credit transactions; the securities laws for investor protection; the requirements for ingredient labeling by the Food and Drug Administration; and standards for fuel economy disclosure by the Environmental Protection Agency. Unlike these cases, however, disclosure in this instance would only be for the three-year period during which equal access is being phased-in.

Finally, a consumer should be able to make a choice of a long distance carrier with the confidence that the information on which his or her original decision was based will not change precipitously, and without notice. Therefore, we feel that long distance companies should be required to notify their customers a reasonable period before the effective date of any rate or major service feature change.

We understand the complexity involved with the new diversity in the industry, yet only in this way—by reducing the current bewilderment of the long distance telephone customers, as he or she is inundated with literature concerning the various alternative long distance telephone companies—will be goals of fair competition, efficient long distance service, and the public interest all be achieved.

We trust you will give this request your careful consideration.

Sincerely,

Donald W. Riegle, Jr., Jennings Randolph, Paul S. Sarbanes, Carl Levin, Thomas F. Eagleton, Paul E. Tsongas, Wendell H. Ford, Jim Sasser, Howard M. Metzenbaum, Dennis DeConcini, Jeff Bingaman, Max Baucus, Christopher J. Dodd, Edward M. Kennedy, David Pryor, Claiborne Pell, Daniel Patrick Moynihan.

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, this letter, in addition to being coauthored by the above Senators, received the support of national consumer groups including the Telecommunications Research and Action Center [TRAC] and the Consumer Federation of America, as well as local groups in my home State including the Public Interest Research Group in Michigan and the Michigan Citizens Lobby.

The response from the Federal Communications Commission was polite but not the action we sought. A copy of that letter is attached below.

According to FCC Chairman Fowler: "Numerous organizations appear to be responding to the need for adequate consumer information." What Chairman Fowler fails to recognize, however, is that some of the very organizations that are attempting to respond to the need for adequate consumer information are the very groups that continue to support my recommendation for a uniform, standard, straightforward language, FCC disclosure requirement.

Very shortly, in my home State of Michigan, our local telephone company, Michigan Bell, will begin offering the same long-distance dialing service to all long-distance companies in a number of different areas throughout the State. Beginning February 16, 1985, if a consumer's telephone number begins with 343, 881, 882, 884, 885, or 886, that person will be able to place his or her long-distance calls with the long-distance company of his or her choice and enjoy the ease of "1 plus" dialing.

This exact same process has already taken place, is about to take place, or shortly will take place in every Senator's State throughout the Nation. I predict, with some degree of certainty, that during the next 2 years every Senator will be hearing from constituents about this phenomenon, about their constituents' confusion in making an intelligent choice of a long-distance carrier, and about the need for more basic, comparative information than consumers are currently receiving. We will also be hearing complaints from consumers about some of the marketing, sales, and pricing practices of some of the long-distance companies currently involved in the equal access process.

Mr. President, today I am introducing the Interstate Telecommunications Consumer Protection Act of 1985 as a followup to my October 10, 1984, letter to Federal Communications Commission Chairman Mark Fowler.

Briefly the Interstate Telecommunications Consumer Protection Act of 1985 provides the following:

First, it gives the Federal Trade Commission jurisdiction over interstate long-distance telephone companies and their advertising and marketing practices where beforehand the FTC had none.

Second, it requires the Federal Communications Commission to promulgate rules to ensure that interstate long-distance telephone companies notify all residential consumers in writing of any change in rates or related charges at least 10 business days before any such charge is to become effective.

Third, it requires interstate long-distance telephone companies to provide consumers with a simple, straightforward, schedule of rates in effect before and then after any rate change is scheduled to be implemented.

Fourth, it requires any company offering interstate long-distance telephone service to maintain a copy of a current rate schedule and related charges at corporate headquarters and to make such schedule and charges available to any consumer upon request.

Fifth, the Interstate Telecommunications Consumer Protection Act of 1985 requires that periodic reports be made to the Congress by both the Federal Communications Commission and the Federal Trade Commission regarding conditions in the telecommunications industry.

The Federal Communications Commission is required to file reports on First, the state of competition in the various sectors of the telecommunications industry; second, the level of rates for interstate long-distance telephone service; and third, the status of universal service including the extent of residential dropoff.

The Federal Trade Commission is required to report on the consumer complaints it has received and actions it has taken regarding its new authority over the interstate long-distance telephone industry.

Sixth, my bill makes clear that no additional Federal funds are necessary for the purposes of carrying out these provisions and it is the intention of Congress that the activities mentioned in the bill be carried out with the existing resources and personnel available at the Federal Communications Commission and Federal Trade Commission.

A few additional comments.

I believe this legislation addresses a fundamental gap in our consumer protection laws. Currently the Federal Trade Commission is the Government agency principally responsible for handling consumer complaints regarding false or deceptive advertisements for most consumer products. The Federal Trade Commission Act prohibits unfair methods of competition in or affecting commerce, and unfair or deceptive acts or practices in or affecting commerce. Under existing law, however, the Federal Trade Commission Act, as drafted, provides a specific exemption for common carriers. Therefore, under existing law, long-distance telephone companies as such do not fall within the jurisdiction of the FTC.

The Interstate Telecommunications Consumer Protection Act of 1985 makes interstate long-distance telephone companies subject to FTC jurisdiction. This legislation specifically provides the FTC with jurisdiction to investigate consumer complaints relating to the advertisement and provision of interstate long-distance telephone service and to determine if any action which is the subject of such a complaint is an unfair method of competition, or an unfair, or deceptive act, or practice. It also provides the Federal Trade Commission with the same administrative and enforcement remedies available to it for other violations of the Federal Trade Commission Act.

At the same time, nothing in this bill limits the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice, the Federal Communications Commission, or any other Federal agency from investigating or taking action concerning the provision of service by telephone companies.

While I do not require it in this legislation, I continue to believe that the Federal Communications Commission should ensure the provision to all potential residential consumers of a standard, uniform disclosure form. Such a form would be organized in a standard manner permitting ready comparison between similar companies offering similar services. Such a form I believe would help minimize consumer confusion caused by the administration during this 2-year period when equal access is being phased in across the country. It might include information concerning: First, basic rates for interstate telephone toll service between the residence of the consumer and telephone exchanges servicing identified cities at set distances; second, the cities and regions of the United States served by the company; third, any additional charges for calls to nonmetropolitan areas; fourth, other factors in the billing structure of the service; fifth, any projected change or increase in such rates, charges, or billing structure expected to occur within a 1-year period after the offering of such service; sixth, other features or options included in such service; and seventh, any other information the Federal Communications Commission determines would be helpful to a consumer of such service to make a cost and service comparison among companies. I did not include such a requirement in my bill because I believe that the fundamental issues included in the Interstate Telecommunications Consumer Protection Act of 1985 should be considered first.

I urge my colleagues to support the Interstate Telecommunications Consumer Protection Act of 1985 so that consumers will have a more meaningful outlet for their complaints and will be able to obtain the basic information that is so vital to choosing a long-distance telephone service.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill and other materials be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION,
Washington, DC, October 25, 1984.

Hon. DONALD W. RIEGLE, Jr.,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR RIEGLE: Thank you for your letter of October 10, 1984, in which you and your colleagues express concern regarding the information currently afforded consumers in selecting the best interexchange telephone carrier for their needs. Your letter reflects the concern that the availability of "equal access" for providers of long distance telephone services now thrusts the consumer "into an arena of decision-making without basic, adequate, comparative information." You suggest that the situation be ameliorated by means of a standard disclosure form, to be developed by the FCC, which each interexchange carrier obtaining equal access be required to complete and send to each potential customer. You further suggest that carriers be required to provide all customers advance notice of rate or major service changes in order to assure that consumers may reasonably rely on the information provided.

While we certainly recognize that consumers need and deserve sufficient and reliable information to make reasoned choices in this area, we believe that the existing and developing sources of relevant consumer assistance information and the concept of a competitive, unregulated marketplace preclude the need for this type of Commission intervention.

I believe that extensive intervention is unwarranted at this point because numerous organizations appear to be responding to the need for adequate consumer information. The Commission is aware of increasing numbers of efforts by carriers, consumer assistance groups and governmental consumer assistance offices at all levels to assist consumers in sorting through the mass of information to select a long distance carrier. Local Better Business Bureaus, state public service commissions, consumer magazines and countless others are providing a variety of brochures and checksheets to assist consumers in their choices. Consumer Checkbook, a Washington based non-profit organization, has developed a comprehensive guide to long distance and other telephone services, including cost comparisons based on actual consumer telephone bills. Consumer Reports has also recently published an extensive comparison of service offerings available from various market participants.

The U.S. Consumer Information Center, under the purview of the White House Special Advisor on Consumer Affairs, is also currently preparing a workbook for nationwide distribution to consumers of long distance telephone service. The workbook, which will be reviewed by our staff, as well as industry and consumer groups, before its release, is designed to assist consumers in how to obtain useful information, what questions to ask, and how to evaluate the information in terms of their particular usage patterns. We believe that efforts of this type should enable consumers to obtain the information they need to make proper decisions both during this transition period to equal access and beyond.

While governmental action of the type you suggest might yield short term benefits, I believe that Commission intervention would be inappropriate at this time because it would be inconsistent with the developing competitive interexchange marketplace this Commission has sought to assure. For over a decade, the FCC has been pursuing a policy of introducing the benefits of competition in the telephone marketplace including equipment, computer-like services and long distance offerings. These efforts, combined with spectacular technological achievements by the industries, have resulted in obvious and dramatically increased benefits in terms of new and better quality services and lower prices.

Throughout our Competitive Carrier proceeding, begun in 1980, this Commission, in order to promote competition and lower costs, has taken repeated steps to identify and eliminate unnecessary regulation of certain classes of carriers in the various telecommunications markets, including the interexchange telephone market. As a result, various unnecessary and costly regulatory burdens have gradually been lifted from non-dominant carriers, including MCI, GTE Sprint, and other similar long distance service providers. Because non-dominant carriers lack market power we have found the filing of rate schedules generally unnecessary and unreasonably burdensome.

While AT&T, with sufficient market power to be considered a dominant carrier, remains subject to full rate and facilities regulation under the Communications Act, the other long distance providers are currently subject to minimal filing requirements. We are continuing these efforts to minimize unnecessary regulatory burdens on non-dominant carriers and are currently considering a mandatory detariffing of these non-dominant "specialized" common carriers. The underlying rationale of these actions is that the nature of a vigorously competitive marketplace should meet the demands of consumers in terms of new, lower priced and better quality offerings. In addition, it is in the carriers' best economic self-interest to make their service offerings understandable to the consumers.

In line with these concerns, I believe that the notification proposal you have advanced could impede the important goal of lower long distance rates. In particular, the proposal's requirement for advance notification to customers before rate or service charges would impose severe contraints on an unregulated carrier's flexibility to respond to dynamic market demands. Limitations on this flexibility would not only interfere with full and fair competition, it would also serve as a disincentive for carriers to lower their long distance rates. Moreover, the imposition of an extensive notification scheme, even for the relatively short transition period to equal access, could impose on carriers potentially significant costs.

While we are not persuaded that Commission intervention is appropriate at this time, we will continue to monitor this situation closely. Accordingly, we would welcome any specific information you might have indicating that the developing assistance resources are not adequate for consumer needs.

We appreciate your interest in a smooth transition to a more vigorous telecommunications industry responsive to the needs of the consumer.

Sincerely,

MARK S. FOWLER,
Chairman.●

By Mr. LAUTENBERG (for himself, Mr. FORD, Mr. ROTH, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. WILSON, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. DURENBERGER, and Mr. GORTON):

S. 339. A bill to implement the rule of the shorter term in the case of computer programs; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

INTERNATIONAL COMPUTER SOFTWARE PROTECTION ACT

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce legislation to preserve international copyright protection of computer software. I am joined by Senators FORD, ROTH, MOYNIHAN, WILSON, RIEGLE, DURENBERGER, and GORTON.

The bill provides that if a foreign nation denies or limits the term of copyright protection of computer software, then the United States shall reciprocally deny or limit protection here of software first published in that nation or by one of its nationals. This step is fully authorized by the Universal Copyright Convention, of which the United States is a signatory.

Mr. President, this legislation is intended to address developments that threaten to undermine the international consensus on the appropriate intellectual property right protection of software. Since 1964, the United States has considered computer software a work of authorship protected by copyright. This view has come to be shared by most industrialized nations, including Japan, the Netherlands, Germany, and the United Kingdom.

Unfortunately, a proposal to abandon copyright protection has been the subject of continuing discussion and deliberations in Japan. The Japanese Ministry of International Trade and Industry [MITI] has considered legislation that would strip software of copyright protection. It would substitute a new, and unique form of intellectual property right protection that would provide lesser protection, of much shorter duration, while providing the Government a right of compulsory licensing.

That this proposal has not yet been submitted to the Japanese Diet is a reflection more of protests from our Nation, than a reaffirmation of copyright by the Japanese. U.S. industry protested. The administration protested. And so did the Congress.

Yet, the idea is not dead. MITI does not embrace the notion of copyright. It is worth noting that at a recent software and computer services industry convention in Tokyo, attended by representatives from industry the world over, members of Japanese industry pressed their view that copyright was inappropriate for software. They maintained that a scheme more suitable to industrial works should be adopted.

Mr. President, copyright protection of computer software has encouraged investment in research, development, and innovation in computer software, and has preserved for American authors the fruits of their labor. According to a recent Department of Commerce report, the United States held as of 1983 an estimated 70 percent of the $18 billion market in software. It is predicted that the industry will grow at a rate of 30 percent a year. By 1987, the United States could hold 75 percent of a $55 billion market.

America's continued dominance is based on its technological leadership, and that leadership is tied to maintaining intellectual property rights. As the Commerce Department report notes in assessing the long-terms prospects for the industry:

The major negative factors affecting the U.S. software industry overseas are likely to be inadequate legal protection of software and restricted access to key foreign markets.

Abandonment of copyright protection will provide our competitors with a short cut to innovation. It would allow them to close the gap without the investment that American firms have made.

The bill we introduce today will take one important step toward securing adequate protection of software. As the Commerce Department notes:

[T]here is little question of the emergence of Japan as the strongest U.S. competitor in the world market.

The bill would provide that Japanese authors could enjoy no greater copyright protection in the United States than that provided to American authors in Japan. Some new kind of patent-like protection is not copyright protection. Regardless of the term of the new protection, it equals zero years of copyright protection. Under this bill, and the Universal Copyright Convention, the United States would, in response, provide zero copyright protection to Japanese works.

This legislation should, I hope, impress upon the Japanese and other nations our strong views on this matter. It should, I hope, deter the Japanese and others from proceeding with proposals that would upset the essential regime of intellectual property right protection.

Mr. President, last year, the Congress adopted as an amendment to the omnibus trade bill a resolution expressing its firm opposition to the MITI proposal, expressing its support for copyright of software, and for appropriate relief if such protections were undermined. I believe the legislation we introduce today is the next logical step.

I am pleased to learn that Senator MATHIAS, chairman of the Subcommittee on Patents, Copyrights and Trademarks of the Senate Judiciary Committee, has expressed an interest in the bill, and in exploring its ramification. I am looking forward to working with him.

I urge all of my colleagues to support this important legislation. It is one measure we can take now to enhance America's competitiveness abroad. It is one step we can take now to ensure that America enjoys the fruits of America's innovation.

I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of my remarks there be printed in the RECORD the text of the bill, an explanation, and a letter of support by the Association of Data Processing Service Organizations [ADAPSO], a software industry trade association.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 339

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "International Computer Software Protection Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. Section 104 of title 17 of the United States Code is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(C) Notwithstanding subsections (a) and (b) of this section, its computer programs are protected under the copyright law of a foreign nation for a period of less than twenty-five years, the protection which would otherwise be granted by this title shall not be granted to computer programs by nationals of such foreign nation or to computer programs first published in such nation.

"(d) Notwithstanding subsections (a) and (b) of this section, if computer programs are protected under the copyright law of a foreign nation for a period of time of twenty-five years or longer, the term of the protection granted under this title for computer programs by nationals of such nation and for computer programs first published in such nation shall not exceed the term of the protection granted to computer programs by the law of such nation.".

EXPLANATION

Subsection C provides that the United States shall provide no copyright protection to software first published in another nation or produced by a national of that nation, if that nation provides no copyright protection for computer software, or provides less than 25 years of such protection. The Universal Copyright Convention defines a term of 25 years as a minimum term of protection for compliance with the convention. If a nation provides a lesser term, it in effect does not provide copyright protection as defined by the U.C.C.

Subsection D provides that if a nation provides copyright protection for computer software for a term exceeding 25 years, but for a term less than that provided by the United States, then the United States shall provide a term of copyright protection of no greater length to software first published in that nation or by one of its nationals.

THE ASSOCIATION OF DATA PROCESSING SERVICE ORGANIZATIONS,
January 30, 1985.

Hon. FRANK R. LAUTENBERG,
United States Senate, Hart Senate Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR FRANK: This is to endorse your proposed legislation amending the U.S. Copyright Act to implement the Rule of the Shorter Term in the case of computer programs.

At its meeting of October 16, 1984, the ADAPSO Board of Directors affirmed its belief in the propriety of copyright protection for computer programs both domestically and internationally. More particularly, the Board took the position of urging the national government to confirm by appropriate legislation the availability of copyright protection for computer software and to resolve remaining problems within the framework of national copyright laws.

Although many countries have recognized the preferability of copyright protection for computer programs, this international consensus has been threatened by the attempts of some to legislate alternative industrial property regimes. Your legislation, along with the efforts of the United States Government and groups like ADAPSO working with their international counterparts, should serve to enhance the role of copyright as a preferred method of legal protection for computer programs.

If ADAPSO may be of assistance to you in the course of the legislative process, please do not hesitate to call upon us.

With warm regards,

JERRY.

By Mr. LEVIN:

S. 340. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to qualify the preapplied insulation portion of exterior siding for the residential energy credit; to the Committee on Finance.

RESIDENTIAL ENERGY CREDIT FOR INSULATED SIDING

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I am today introducing legislation which amends the Energy Tax Act of 1978 to qualify preapplied insulation—insulation applied directly onto exterior alumium siding at the factory—for a residential energy tax credit.

Under current law, insulation installed at the home qualifies for the tax credit. Insulation applied to aluminum siding at the factory, however, does not. This is a result of the Internal Revenue Service's [IRS] interpretation of the law—the law itself passed by Congress did not address the tax treatment of insulated siding. It is simply inequitable to give a tax credit for insulation applied at the home but not for the same material which is attached to the siding at the factory.

The IRS bases its reason for denying a tax credit for insulated siding on the fact that aluminum siding without insulation applied does not qualify for a tax credit. The IRS argues that aluminum siding is primarily decorative rather than primarily energy saving and thus excluded from the energy tax credit. Insulated siding, however, contains energy saving insulation and should not be treated in the same manner as noninsulated aluminum siding for tax purposes.

This legislation permits a tax credit only for the preapplied insulation and not for the aluminum siding to which it is attached. It simply treats preapplied insulation as any other insulation for tax purposes.

The current residential energy tax credits are set to expire at the end of this year, unless Congress extends them. It is my hope that the Congress will extend these credits and, in the process, make the modification which is included in the legislation I am introducing today. Energy conservation should remain a national priority and we should continue to encourage homeowners to take energy-saving steps. Not only do the homeowners benefit by lower utility costs, the Nation moves closer to the goal of energy independence.

By Mr. GRASSLEY (for himself, Mr. HEFLIN, Mrs. KASSEBAUM, Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. DENTON, Mr. SIMON, Mr. KASTEN, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. MELCHER, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. EAGLETON, and Mr. PELL):

S. 341. A bill to amend section 552(a)(4)(F) of title 5 of the United States Code, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

LEGAL PROTECTION FOR WHISTLEBLOWERS

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, last year I, along with 21 of my colleagues, sponsored a bill that would enhance legal protections for Federal whistleblowers. This bill was passed unanimously in the Senate, but fell victim in the House to a last-ditch effort of opposition on the part of the Justice Department. Consequently, the outlook for whistleblower security continues to appear gloomy at best.

If words could be considered evidence of intent, one would have thought this administration was not only willing, but anxious to aid the plight of civil servants who dare to speak up about failings in our system. In 1981, President Reagan said:

> The vital element in any program designed to fight fraud and waste is the willingness of employees to come forward when they see this sort of activity. They must be assured that when they "blow the whistle," they will be protected and their information properly investigated.

Words, however, are often contradicted by actions. In the last 4 years we have seen materialize the exact opposite of President Reagan's expressed desires.

The administration's own survey has found nearly 70 percent of observed waste or fraud is going unreported for two basic reasons; One, the belief that nothing will be done to correct the activity and; two, the fear of reprisal.

Perhaps most disturbing though is the finding that since 1980, fear of reprisal among would-be whistleblowers has nearly doubled.

What does this mean? It means that despite the high-toned rhetoric and assurances about protections, and despite the supposed safeguarding mechanisms within the system, reality tells us there is virtually no protection for whistleblowers—and it's getting worse.

While I am citing statistical findings here, I didn't need numbers and statistics to conclude in my own mind that we have a grave problem. I have been in direct contact with various whistleblowers over the past 3 years and witnessed the types of rewards heaped on them by the system. Harassment, demotions and undesired relocations are the only prizes they have collected for what one whistleblower has termed "committing truth".

This system of rewards and punishments in practice is evidence of a bureaucracy whose incentives produce the direct opposite of its stated goals. In other words, the objectives of an efficient Government, as outlined by President Reagan's 1981 statement, cannot be attained as long as the system's incentives generate activity 180 degrees in the reverse direction.

The bill I am introducing today along with Senators HEFLIN, KASSEBAUM, PROXMIRE, DENTON, SIMON, KASTEN, INOUYE, MELCHER, BOSCHWITZ, EAGLETON, and PELL, would not by itself turn this system around. What it will do though is provide whistleblowers with a legal remedy if they have suffered retaliation from superiors for their disclosures of waste, abuse, mismanagement, or fraud.

Presently civil servants who suffer reprisal are tried entirely within the administrative system. If the system prevails, the whistleblower is at the end of his rope. However, if the whistleblower happens to succeed through the administrative route, those found guilty of retaliation do have another chance to have their case heard in the outside judicial arena.

This bill would equalize the appeal rights, so that whistleblowers by themselves, or through the Office of the Special Counsel, could seek protections in Federal court. It would also allow application to the court for protective orders, enforcement of subpoenas, and injunctions against interference and harassment.

I plan to hold hearings on this bill in the Subcommittee on Administrative Practice and Procedure and explore additional ways to provide civil servants with effective protections.

Mr. President, Congress bears an important responsiblity to determine the context in which our civil servants work. If the objectives and principles espoused in our Code of Ethics are directly countered by how the work of Government is actually executed, then we will destroy any noble sense of purpose among our civil servants, and feed a cancer of cynicism.

It is our intent—those of us sponsoring this bill—that we work toward matching up reality with the goals of a moral and efficient Government. I hope the rest of our colleagues will join us in this effort.

I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 341

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Congress finds and affirms that—

(1) the Code of Ethics for Government Service charges that any person in government service should expose corruption wherever discovered;

(2) reprisals against employees who report incidents of fraud, waste and mismanagement is prohibited by law;

(3) the Constitution protects the rights of all citizens; and

(4) every person has a right to seek remedies to protect their individual rights.

SEC. 2. Section 552(a)(4)(F) of title 5, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "The Special Counsel may obtain judicial review of a final order or decision rendered by the Board in actions brought pursuant to Sec. 1206 and 1207 of this title. Employees affected by an agency action subject to the Special Counsel complaint and who are aggrieved by the final decision may file a petition to intervene as a matter of right and will be considered a party to the proceeding. In corrective actions, the agency responsible for the matter giving rise to the Special Counsel complaint before the Board shall be the named respondent. In disciplinary actions, the respondent employees named in the Special Counsel complaint before the Board shall be the named respondent in the judicial proceeding. Petitions brought pursuant to this subpart shall be filed with the District Court and the right of a trial de novo and appellant review shall be preserved. The Special Counsel may file a petition for enforcement of subpoena and protective orders with the District Court pursuant to investigative and prosecutorial authority granted to the Special Counsel."

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, today Senator GRASSLEY and I are reintroducing legislation to strengthen protections for Government employees who reveal waste, fraud, and mismanagement they see on the job. This legislation is identical to S. 2927, which unanimously passed the U.S. Senate in the closing hours of the 98th Congress. Unfortunately, the House of Representatives failed to act on the bill.

Mr. President, the continued waste and mismanagement of taxpayer dollars is intolerable. Under the distinguished leadership of my colleague from Iowa, Senator GRASSLEY, the Administrative Practice and Procedure Subcommittee has delved deeply into this problem.

I was outraged to hear Defense Department employees testify before the subcommittee that the Department is paying $700 for hammers that can be bought at the hardware store for $7. When employees attempt to bring horror stories like these to the attention of their superiors, they are harrassed, intimidated, transferred, or fired. Auditors uncovering millions of dollars of waste are instructed not to rock the boat, while millions more go down the drain.

It is so dangerous to be honest these days that William J. O'Connor, the Special Counsel created to protect whistleblowers, has advised potential whistleblowers: "Don't put your head up, or it will get blown off." A 1984 Merit Systems Protection Board survey revealed the number of civil servants afraid to speak out about waste and mismanagement has actually increased since the Office of Special Counsel was created. The very office created to protect these courageous employees has failed to do so—and failed miserably. The Justice Department maintains that the protections currently in place are working. This survey proves they are not.

Our bill would give the Special Counsel the authority to seek protective orders in Federal court, enforce subpoenas, and prevent agencies from harassing whistleblowers. Most importantly, it would give the Special Counsel the power to seek review of Merit Systems Protection Board orders in Federal court.

Mr. President, the need for these modest, but vital reforms in the Special Counsel's power is irrefutable. Taxpayer money would be saved, Government efficiency promoted, and honest Government employees rewarded.

I urge my colleages to join with us in this effort.

By Mr. DECONCINI:

S. 351. A bill entitled the "American Copper Production Act of 1985"; to the Committee on Finance.

AMERICAN COPPER PRODUCTION ACT

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, on June 27, 1984, the International Trade Commission unanimously agreed that the American copper industry has been seriously injured by foreign imports. In recommending remedies for this injury, two of the Commissioners recommend the imposition of quotas and two recommended the imposition of tariffs.

On September 6, President Reagan rejected the ITC decision. In doing so, he turned his back on the 29,000 men and women currently in the copper mining labor force and those thousands of Americans who have already lost their jobs with the closing of three-fourths of America's largest copper mines. Furthermore, President Reagan's decision put into deep jeopardy our Nation's ability to supply itself with this strategic metal during a national emergency, leaving us, instead, to depend on unstable Third World nations, such as Zambia, Chile, and Zaire.

Our copper industry's foreign competitors, many of which are Government-subsidized and benefit from U.S. foreign-aid dollars, are not responsive to the free-market system. Only the privately owned producers in the United States and Canada have responded to recent decreases in world demand for copper with decreased production. Most other foreign producers have responded to decreased demand for copper by either maintaining or increasing their production. Rather than responding to market forces, these producers are motivated by their Government's need to generate foreign exchange, maintain domestic employment, and service massive international-debt obligations. These are the conclusions which led the International Trade Commission to recommend import relief.

The legislation which I am introducing today is designed to stop the serious injury to the copper industry which the ITC unanimously found to exist. It incorporates the proposals of the two ITC Commissioners who recommended that import relief be provided through the imposition of quotas. Both of these Commissioners proposed that the President impose quantitative restrictions on for a 5-year period in an aggregate amount of 425,000 short tons per year on imports of black copper, blister copper, and anode copper, provided for in item 612.03 of the TSUS, and unwrought copper, other than alloyed, provided for in item 612.06 of the TSUS, as follows: 375,000 short tons annually for unwrought copper, other than alloyed, provided for in item 612.06 of the TSUS, which tonnage shall include a separate allocation of 25,000 short tons for wire bar, and 50,000 short tons annually for black copper, blister copper, and anode copper, provided for in item 612.03 of the TSUS. These quotas would be administered on a country-by-country basis in a manner to be determined by the President, and no more than 25 percent of a country's annual allocation would be permitted to enter in any calendar quarter.

This legislation is necessary to promote and expand the economic viability of the U.S. copper industry and to prevent further declines in its work force, production, and market position. If enacted, this bill will provide sales volume and price relief for copper producers and will enhance the industry's ability to be truly competitive in the long term. The increased market share that will be obtained by domestic producers will allow them to achieve reductions in stocks, increase their utilization of domestic copper mining and smelting facilities, and continue their efforts to enhance efficiency and competitiveness.

Mr. President, I strongly believe that the copper industry must take full advantage of the relief this bill would give them by investing in copper facilities, reducing costs, and striving for greater efficiency. In fact, many copper producers in this country has already made a substantial commitment to pursue these means of insuring long-term viability. Much of the industry has taken steps to modernize equipment, develop and utilize technological innovation, institute extensive cost-saving programs, and increase productivity.

Unfortunately, the massive losses suffered by our Nation's copper industry in recent years have led to deferrals or cancellations of many of these needed improvements. Significant capital investment in technology and facilities is virtually impossible under current conditions in the copper industry. A continuation of high levels of imported copper jeopardizes the overall effort of the industry to modernize and enhance competitiveness. Stabilization of import levels is needed to allow reinvestment and continued gains in productivity. During the temporary period of relief proposed in this bill, the copper industry would have the opportunity, and the obligation, to make real strides in investment and cost saving. With this opportunity, however, the copper producers of this country can be competitive and viable over the long term.

Mr. President, the copper industry of the United States is critical to the maintenance of a strong industrial economy and to the national defense. The effect on this industry of unfair production and exports by foreign copper producers has been devastating as the International Trade Commission has recognized. It is time that we stopped allowing the United States to be used as a respository for the overproduction of copper by producers who are unaffected by the world supply and demand. This bill will do that, and will be one step toward restoring the true competitive position of the U.S. industry.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of this bill be printed in the RECORD. I urge my colleagues to study the bill and give it their support.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 352. A bill to amend the Urban Mass Transportation Act of 1964; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

PUBLIC TRANSIT IMPROVEMENT ACT OF 1985

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, today I am introducing the Public Transit Improvement Act of 1985. Mass transit plays a crucial role throughout the Nation and this bill provides beneficial amendments to the Surface Transportation Assistance Act of 1982 [STAA].

This legislation will provides essential funding levels to support mass transit, both in urban and rural communities, and will enable transit systems across the country to provide better service to passengers and to assist those areas which are appropriate for new start transit systems.

The STAA was a landmark statute for mass transit. For the first time, Congress created a special mass transit trust account to fund discretionary capital grants for transit projects. In addition, formula grants were made to depend on predictable service related factors, as well as population factors. By passing the STAA, Congress recognized the vital role of mass transit and made a commitment to its future growth.

This bill will continue the spirit of that commitment: To meet the mobility needs of urban and rural citizens, the poor, the elderly, and the handicapped. The legislation:

Increases authorization levels for section 3, mass transit trust account, from $1.1 to $1.3 billion in fiscal year 1985 and from $1.1 to $1.4 billion in fiscal year 1986. Also, the bill will extend the authorization for section 3 through fiscal year 1987 at a level of $1.5 billion.

Restores the 3-for-2 trade-in provisions of the STAA and authorizes them through fiscal year 1986. These provisions allow transit systems to receive $2 in operating assistance for every $3 in capital funds traded in to UMTA. Under current law, these provisions expired at the end of fiscal year 1984.

Provides that those transit systems which exercise the 3-for-2 swap are not eligible for discretionary capital grants except for emergency purposes.

Defines emergency discretionary capital grants and describes the circumstances under which such grants may be made.

Expands the definition of associated capital maintenance costs by lowering the eligible threshold cost from 1 to 0.5 percent, and includes as eligible expenses, the cost of leasing equipment and facilities; for example, computers, heavy construction equipment.

Earmarks a portion of section 3 discretionary capital grants for transit crime prevention grants.

Provides for multiyear contracting authority in order to enable local transit systems to better plan construction projects and financing arrangements.

Clarifies congressional intent regarding operating assistance for newly urbanized by indicating that 40 percent of such areas' authorized section 9 funds may be used for operating assistance.

There is a simply enormous need for transit funding. The American Public Transit Association, representing bus and rail transit systems which carry 94 percent of all transit riders in the United States, estimates that $36 billion will be needed to cover transit capital needs over the next 5 years.

The funds exist to increase authorizations. CBO, in recent testimony last year before a House committee, repeated that the funds are available from the 1 penny of the gas tax to increase the authorizations. In fact, CBO's testimony stated:

> While the surplus generated by the Mass Transit Account is of some small help in offsetting the Nation's $180 billion budget deficit, such use diverts the trust fund from its intended purpose, that of financing new transit investments.

Additional funds in the section 3 program will enable transit properties to replace aging buses, accelerate badly needed rail modernization work, and construct new systems which have a local commitment and meet objective cost-effective criteria.

We in Congress earmarked 1 penny of the gas tax increase specifically for mass transit—these are the funds which we are now attempting to spend, and that we are entitled to spend, but not 1 cent more. Federal law intends that the Government spend these funds on mass transit and any attempts to transfer them to the highway account must be opposed.

In addition, this bill will restore the 3-for-2 swap provisions that expired at the end of fiscal year 1984. During 1983, nearly 70 transit systems traded in over $40 million in capital funds and received $26 million in operating assistance. The $13 million which resulted from these trade-ins was used primarily by the Nation's smaller bus operations. The bill will enable transit operators to continue to have the flexibility to exercise this trade-in; however, those which do trade in capital for operating funds will not be permitted to receive section 3 capital funds, except under compelling circumstances, or to honor existing Federal funding commitments.

Another important element of this bill is the earmark of a portion of the increase in authorizations from section 3 for transit crime and security related capital equipment. Transit crime is a significant problem throughout the Nation's transit systems. It erodes the Federal investment in these facilities. It is both morally sound and fiscally prudent for the Federal Government to promote ridership and to protect its investment by helping transit properties enhance safety and security measures.

Mass transit not only provides essential public service, but it is also a $13 billion a year industry, employing more than 900,000 people. A public investment of $100 million in transit can be expected to generate 7,500 to 9,000 jobs, as well as stimulate private sector development, broaden the tax base, and promote retail sales. It is essential to the vitality of cities: It has been shown that for each $1 invested in public transit, more than $3 will accrue in business revenue.

Mass transit has been a part of American life for more than 150 years. It helped promote the growth of urban centers, as well as suburban areas. Often, it is the only efficient and economical method of transporting citizens in densely populated urban areas. During the 1970's, when Americans were held in the paralyzing grip of the oil shortage and the subsequent increases in energy prices, the critical value of well planned, efficient transit systems became evident.

The economic health and growth of our cities, towns, and outlying villages depends on the extent and dependability of their transportation links. This bill will provide essential Federal funds to maintain, create, and improve the mass transit systems throughout this Nation. It must be adopted.

Mr. President, I asked unanimous consent that this bill be printed in the RECORD in its entirety at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Section 3(a) of the Urban Mass Transportation Act of 1964 is amended to read as follows: "(4)(A) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary is authorized, in connection with the initial funding of a project under this section, to establish a basis for multi-year financing of such project through the issuance of a multi-year project obligation to the recipient agency. At least thirty days prior to the issuance of amendment of any such obligation under this paragraph, the Secretary shall notify, in writing, the Committee on Public Works and Transportation of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs of the Senate, of the proposed issuance of such an obligation. Such obligations shall stipulate the Secretary's maximum future participation in the financing of a defined project, including an estimated annual rate of participation, and the total amount so stipulated shall, when issued for a new fixed guideway project, be sufficient to complete an operable segment. The total amount of future Federal expenditures contained within such multi-year obligations shall not exceed seventy-five per centum of the aggregate contract authority amounts authorized in section 21(a)(2)(B), nor shall the amounts estimated for use in any given fiscal year exceed 75 per centum of the amounts authorized for that fiscal year. Based on this table, the Secretary shall prepare and publish, prior to the commencement of the fiscal year, an apportionment of funds necesssary to sustain the projects approved under subparagraph (A) for the coming year. Such funds shall be released to the recipient agencies on the first day of the fiscal year and may be obligated by the recipient agencies to meet project costs or to be applied to the payment of principal and interest on bonds, notes, or other obligations issued by the recipient to finance project costs. Federal obligations under this paragraph shall be charged to the budget year in which funds are released to recipient agencies.".

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my distinguished colleague from New York to introduce the Public Transportation Improvement Act of 1985. This legislation provides the much-needed assistance required to preserve the integrity of our Nation's mass transit systems. The health and growth of our cities depends upon this legislation which authorizes a steady and predictable source of Federal funds for transit.

In 1982, I was an original cosponsor of the Surface Transportation Act of 1982 [STAA]. In that landmark legislation, Congress demonstrated its recognition of, and its commitment to, mass transit. The bill introduced today will renew that commitment.

Title III of the STAA created a new mass transit account under the highway trust fund. This account is funded by 1 cent of the 9 cent per gallon gasoline tax. The legislation we are offering today will not alter the manner by which this account is funded. Most importantly, this bill will not add to the Federal deficit and will not result in a tax increase. The money has already been collected and is sitting in the mass transit account. Our objective is to provide authority to spend these funds in the manner which Congress intended that they be spent.

Unless the authorization levels are raised to utilize all of the funds in the penny set-aside account, it will be impossible for transit authorities in Pennsylvania and across the United States to meet their capital needs. According to the American Public Transit Association, the capital needs of the transit industry exceed $36 billion over the next 5 years. Therefore, it is crucial that the Congress not allow tax moneys intended for transit capital needs to lie idle.

Earlier this month, I was able to tour and review transit operations in both Philadelphia and Pittsburgh. As a result of my examination of the transit situation in these cities, I am convinced that the Public Transit Improvement Act is the key to their survival. The current authorization levels are insufficient to solve the problems caused by years of deterioration in our major mass transit systems.

America's mass transit authorities must have additional capital assistance in order to run safe and efficient systems at a reasonable cost. Without the additional funds, fares will skyrocket out of the reach of our Nation's poor, elderly and handicapped. Transit riders will return to our already overcrowded and deteriorated roads, and our environmental quality will decline significantly.

Mr. President, the measure we are introducing today will provide essential Federal moneys to maintain and improve mass transit systems throughout this Nation without increasing taxes or the deficit. I urge my colleagues to lend their support.●

● Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I would like to join my distinguished colleague from New York, Senator D'AMATO, in sponsoring S. 352, the Public Transit Improvement Act of 1985.

This legislation seeks to increase the authorization levels for section 3—the Mass Transit Discretionary Account—from $1.1 billion to $1.5 billion over the next 3 fiscal years. These funds are urgently needed by mass transit authorities throughout the country for necessary capital improvement projects. This commitment will assist transit organizations who need to repair aging bus fleets and unsafe rail commuter systems.

On Monday, January 28, 1985, I visited the Southeastern Pennsylvania Transportation Authority [SEPTA] headquartered in Philadelphia and witnessed first hand the serious problems that many transit organizations are experiencing. With SEPTA officials, I inspected two rail bridges that were deteriorated and identified by an engineering study as being "severe"—the worst possible rating. The necessary repair of these two bridges will cost approximately $2 million. However, SEPTA is faced with an $11 million deficit this fiscal year and lacks the funding needed for reconstruction and overhaul of these bridges.

In fact, SEPTA was forced to close a rail bridge on its Columbia Avenue branch in November 1984, when they discovered that the bridge was unsafe. The closure of this bridge severed commuter access to Philadelphia's Center City Tunnel which funnels thousands of people to city shopping malls. A total of $2.4 million was used by SEPTA to replace this vital link.

It is important to point out that these three bridges that I mentioned are only a minor part of the problem. SEPTA maintains 435 rail bridges covering a 246-mile system with the average age of a bridge being 75 years. SEPTA has identified 34 critical bridges which are presently deficient and in need of repair within 4 years. Between $60 to $75 million would be needed to repair these bridges.

It is my sense that mass transit operating subsidies are indispensable to the continued operations of many transit authorities. The new authorized levels of funding in this bill would indicate the Federal Government's support of mass transit activities as well as providing crucial funds to help alleviate serious deficiencies in many transit systems.

Finally, Mr. President, this legislation would not add to the deficit, but would accurately reflect incoming revenues estimated by the Congressional Budget Office from the penny a gallon gas tax dedicate to mass transit.

I would like to conclude by saying that the transit industry is very important to Pennsylvania. It is a $1 billion business and provides over 12,000 desperately needed jobs directly and over 80,000 indirectly. I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.●

By Mr. DECONCINI:

S. 353. A bill to increase the duty on imported copper by an amount which offsets the cost incurred by copper producers in the United States in meeting domestic environmental requirements; to the Committee on Finance.

COPPER ENVIRONMENTAL EQUALIZATION ACT

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, our Nation's domestic copper industry is facing a very real and serious financial crisis. Unemployment is high; production levels are the lowest since the Great Depression; and foreign imports of copper are at the highest in this country's history. There are many reasons for this situation—some that we in the Congress have the ability to do something about and others which will require action by the executive branch. The legislation I am introducing today is a responsible and reasonable approach to resolving a portion of the copper problem, and I believe it makes eminent sense.

At the heart of the copper industry's financial woes is unfair foreign competition. Domestic producers must compete in the same international markets as foreign producers who may receive subsidies from their own government or assistance for plant expansion and rehabilitation through multilateral international financing organizations. At the same time, such plants do not have to invest substantial sums of money to meet environmental standards like we do in the United States.

Certainly wage scales and employee benefits, health and safety requirements, and environmental regulations add to the costs of our domestic copper production. Consequently, the price per pound of copper produced in the United States is higher than copper produced in many foreign countries. However, the added costs to protect labor and our environment, I believe, are for the most part warranted and worthwhile. These requirements reflect certain values which we, as Americans, feel are important sacrifices we must make in order to protect the strength of our Nation, and in particular, the strength of our domestic labor force and long-term environmental health.

On the other hand, Mr. President, why should American industry be forced to suffer at the hands of foreign governments who do not share our values and priorities. Copper is a critical strategic material vital to this country's national security. In order to ensure a ready supply of this strategic material for domestic and defense purposes, we must have a strong and healthy industry. This Nation's copper industry is an efficient and cost-effective one. It does not have the benefit of governmental subsidies; but in order to comply with environmental regulations and meet our national objectives, it must invest millions of dollars in control technology equipment. The costs for plant modification and emission controls are reflected in the end price per pound of copper produced. Calculations of the cost for environmental controls in the United States range anywhere from 10 to 15 cents per pound of copper. The cost of production of some foreign copper is not governed by any environmental regulations.

In order to achieve equity, protect our Nation's domestic industry, and place foreign countries on notice that we will not allow them to undercut domestic production, I believe we ought to levy a duty, on a sliding-scale basis, on copper products coming into this country from nations not having environmental standards and regulations comparable to those in the United States. This action, Mr. President, will not impact countries which compete fairly and have in place strong environmental regulations. It will, however, affect nations which continue to produce high levels of copper even during periods of recession, and which do not have similar environmental laws. The Environmental Equalization Tariff Act authorizes the President, under the guidance of the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, to impose an environmental tariff, not to exceed 15 cents per pound, on copper imported from countries which do not have clean air standards. The result, Mr. President, will be a stronger domestic copper industry and a message being sent foreign countries that we do not agree with and do not condone their lack of environmental standards.

Until recently, Mr. President, our domestic copper industry was internationally competitive. As times and laws have changed, however, we have placed ourselves at an unfair economic disadvantage. We, as a nation, need to assess our trade practices and priorities. I believe environmental equalization is a very good place to start. It will not only protect our industry here at home but it will make a major contribution toward improving our global environment.

Mr. President, I request unanimous consent that the full text of my bill, the Environmental Equalization Tariff Act of 1985, appear in the RECORD at this point. I further urge the bill's expeditous consideration by the members of the Finance Committee.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 353

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Copper Environmental Equalization Act of 1985".

PURPOSE

SEC. 2. The purpose of this Act is—

(1) to enhance the world's environment by encouraging foreign copper producers to adopt environmental measures substantially equivalent to those employed in the United States; and

(2) to offset the cost advantage obtained by foreign copper producers who do not employ environmental measures substantially equivalent to those imposed on domestic copper producers.

AMENDMENTS TO THE TARIFF SCHEDULES OF THE UNITED STATES

ADJUSTMENTS TO COPPER EQUALIZATION DUTY

SEC. 4. (a) The President shall, under the circumstances described in subsection (b), adjust the duty imposed on an article of copper under part 5 of the Appendix to the Tariff Schedules of the United States (19 U.S.C. 1202).

(b) The President shall, based upon determinations of the various environmental costs of production by the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency (hereinafter in this Act referred to as the "Administrator") under section 6—

(1) increase the duty imposed by such part 5 on an article of copper by an amount equal to the amount by which—

(A) the United States environmental costs of production per pound of such article, exceed

(B) the sum of—

(i) the foreign environmental costs of production per pound of such article, plus

(ii) the amount of such duty (prior to such increase); and

(2) decrease the duty imposed by such part 5 on an article of copper, by an amount equal to the amount by which—

(A) the sum of—

(i) the foreign environmental cost of production per pound of such article, plus

(ii) the amount of such duty (prior to such decrease), exceeds

(B) the United States environmental cost of production per pound of such article.

PROPOSALS FOR ADJUSTMENT TO THE COPPER EQUALIZATION DUTY

SEC. 5. The Secretary of the Treasury (hereinafter in this act referred to as the "Secretary") shall by regulation prescribe a procedure by which interested parties may propose an adjustment in the rate of duty under section 4. If the Secretary finds pursuant to such procedure that there may be cause to make an adjustment under section 4, he shall request the Administrator to make a determination under section 6 of each of the environmental costs of production required to be made by such section.

DETERMINATION OF ENVIRONMENTAL COSTS OF PRODUCTION

SEC. 6. (a) The Administrator shall by regulation prescribe a method or methods for the determination of environmental costs of production for the articles of copper subject to the duty imposed by part 5 of the Appendix to the Tariff Schedules of the United States (19 U.S.C. 1202), which shall include a method or methods for the determination of the foreign environmental cost of production of such an article of copper in cases in which environmental costs of production have been incurred in more than one country.

(b) When requested by the Secretary under section 5, the Administrator shall, applying the methods prescribed under subsection (a), determine—

(1) the environmental cost of production for each phase of processing of each article for which such request is made, with respect to each country in which such processing occurs, and

(2) the comparable environmental cost of production of such article in the United States for each such phase.

The foreign environmental cost of production shall be computed with respect to each such article for each combination of countries in which such article may be processed for importation into the United States.

REDUCTION OF DUTIES

SEC. 7. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the President may reduce the duty which is imposed on articles of copper by part 5 of the Appendix to the Tariff Schedules of the United States (19 U.S.C. 1202) only in accordance with the provisions of this Act.

AMENDMENT TO THE TRADE ACT OF 1974

SEC. 8. Paragraph (1) of section 503(c) of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2463(c)) is amended—

(1) by striking out "and" at the end of subparagraph (F);

(2) by striking out the period at the end of subparagraph (G) and inserting in lieu thereof ", and"; and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new subparagraph:

"(H) copper articles which are subject to the duty imposed by part 5 of the Appendix to the Tariff Schedules of the United States (19 U.S.C. 1202).".

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 9. For purposes of this Act—

(1) The term "environmental cost of production" means any cost incurred in the mining, milling, smelting, or refining of, or in any other phase of the processing of, an article of copper that is attributable to compliance with any law or regulation of the country in which such processing occurs which is designed for the purpose of protecting the environment.

(2) the term "United States environmental cost of production" means the aggregate of the environmental costs of production of an article of copper—

(A) which would be subject to the duty imposed by part 5 of the Appendix to the Tariff Schedules of the United States (19 U.S.C. 1202) if it were imported into the United States, and

(B) for which each phase of the processing occurs in the United States.

(3) The term "foreign environmental cost of production" means the aggregate of the environmental costs of production of an article of copper subject to the duty imposed by part 5 of such Appendix which is imported into the United States.

SEC. 10. The provisions of this Act shall be effective with respect to articles entered, or withdrawn from warehouse, for consumption after the date that is 15 days after the date of enactment of this Act.

By BOSCHWITZ (for himself and Mr. DURENBERGER):

S. 354. A bill to provide for separation of Mille Lacs Band of Chippewa Indians from the Minnesota Chippewa Tribe; to the Select Committee on Indian Affairs.

MILLE LACS BAND OF CHIPPEWA INDIANS SEPARATION ACT

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, today I am reintroducing legislation at the request of the Mille Lacs Band of Chippewa Indians to allow the Mille Lacs Band to separate from the Minnesota Chippewa Tribe, a confederation of six separate and distinct Chippewa bands, which the Mille Lacs Band joined in 1936.

I introduced this bill near the end of the 98th Congress with the commitment it would be reintroduced early this year. At that time I received the assurance of the chairman of the Select Committee on Indian Affairs, Senator ANDREWS, that a hearing would be scheduled early in the session.

The Mille Lacs Band historically has functioned as an independent tribal policy. During the past 150 years, the band has struggled, with great tenacity, to preserve its separate identity, to govern itself, and to determine its own future.

In recent years, the band has endeavored to reorganize its tribal government to incorporate the principle—often lacking in tribal governments—of separation of powers. To the regret of the Mille Lacs Band it has realized that their goal of a reorganized and revitalized tribal government cannot be achieved so long as it remains a member of the confederation known as the Minnesota Chippewa Tribe.

I believe that what the Mille Lacs Band seeks is right and proper. Allowing the Mille Lacs Band to achieve full self-government fulfills the commitment of the United States to Indian self-determination.

This legislation should not increase costs to the Federal Government. It does not seek additional services or programs. It seeks only to fulfill the promise of tribal self-determination, which is at the heart of our Indian policy.

By Mr. ZORINSKY (for himself, Mr. HELMS, Mr. PRYOR, Mr. ANDREWS, Mr. BAUCUS, Mr. BENTSEN, Mr. COCHRAN, Mr. DIXON, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. MELCHER, Mr. EXON, and Mr. HEFLIN):

S. 355. A bill to strengthen the operation of the agricultural stabilization and conservation committee system, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

AGRICULTURAL STABILIZATION AND CONSERVATION COMMITTEE ACT

Mr. ZORINSKY. Mr. President, today, I am introducing the Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Committee Act of 1985, which will assure the continuation of a grassroots approach to farm program administration through farmer-elected committees at the county and community level. This bill passed the Senate last year as S. 1643 without a dissenting vote. But it failed to pass the House of Representatives in the rush toward adjournment of the 98th Congress.

The bill I am introducing today is identical to the bill passed June 29, 1984, with the support and encouragement of my distinguished colleague from North Carolina, the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry, Senator JESSE HELMS. Joining me in introducing this legislation in the 99th Congress, in addition to Senator HELMS, are Senators PRYOR, ANDREWS, BAUCUS, BENTSEN, COCHRAN, HEFLIN, DIXON, LEAHY, MELCHER, and EXON.

Mr. President, for more than 50 years now, the farmer-elected committee system has played a vital role in administering farm programs in our Nation. Established by the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1933, it has achieved the extremely worthwhile goal of putting the day-to-day operation of these programs in the hands of those best equipped to handle the task—the farmers themselves.

Unfortunately, Mr. President, at various times over the years, and again recently, attempts have been made to eliminate these panels or scale down their use. Such actions by the Reagan administration fully justify attempts by Congress to clarify the status and standing of these committees.

The farmer-elected committees are more important today than ever before. At a time when further reductions in programs are possible, we must have experienced leadership in place with firsthand knowledge of local problems and conditions. Otherwise, with the farm economy at a half-century low point, it will be just that much more difficult for hard-pressed farmers to stay in business.

Beefed up use of both ASCS personnel and records by the Federal Crop Insurance likewise increases the need for community committee members. The need for fair and equitable yields established by the committees is essential to both the farmer and the USDA.

This bill allows the number of community committees nationwide to rise back to the number in existence on December 31, 1980, with the approval of the county committees. It increases the term of community committee members from 1 to 3 years, spells out their duties for the first time, and increases the pay for both county and community committee members.

The bill also reduces the minimum number of annual community committee meetings from four to one and limits to four the number of annual meetings for which committee members can be compensated.

It has been my privilege to consult with the leaders of the National Association of Farmer Elected Committeemen in drawing up this legislation. I can report that they are in total agreement with its content.

Mr. President, these provisions represent a reasonable approach to allowing the farmer-elected committee system to continue as it has in the past. It is important that this legislation reach the White House as soon as possible. Hopefully, that will send a message to the Reagan administration that further attempts to reduce these grassroots committees would be both unwise and unwarranted.

At this point, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the bill I am introducing as well as the remarks made when this legislation passed the Senate last June by my good friend from North Carolina [Mr. HELMS] the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Committee Act of 1985".

LOCAL COMMITTEES

SEC. 2. (a) The fifth paragraph of section 8(b) of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act (16 U.S.C. 590h(b)) is amended by—

(1) inserting, after the third sentence, the following: "The county committee for a county, by majority vote, may petition the Secretary to change the number of local areas in the county, and the Secretary shall make such change as petitioned by the county committee, except that any such change may not result in the number of local areas in a county exceeding the number of such areas in the county on December 31, 1980.";

(2) striking out "annually" in the fourth sentence;

(3) inserting, after the fourth sentence, the following: "Each member of a local committee shall be elected for a term of three years. Each local committee shall meet (1) one time each year, and (2) at the direction of the county committee, with the approval of the State committee, such additional times during the year as may be necessary to carry out this section. Notwithstanding section 388 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938 (7 U.S.C. 1388), the Secretary may not provide compensation or payments to a member of a local committee under such section for work performed at, or travel expenses incurred in attending, more than four meetings of such committee in any year. The meetings of a local committee shall be held on different days of the year."; and

(4) inserting after the eighth sentence, the following: "The local committees in each county shall (1) in counties in which there are more than one local committee, serve as advisors and consultants to the county committee; (2) periodically meet with the county committee and State committee to be briefed on farm program issues; (3) communicate with producers within their communities on issues or concerns regarding farm programs; (4) report to the county committee, the State committee, and others on changes to, or modifications of, farm programs recommended by producers in their communities; and (5) perform such other functions required by law or as the Secretary may specify. The Secretary shall ensure that the information regarding changes in the Federal laws in effect with respect to agriculture programs and in the administration of such laws, are communicated in a timely manner to the local committees for areas that contains farmers who might be affected by such changes.".

(b) The amendments made by subsection (a) of this section shall take effect on January 1, 1986, except that the amendments made by clauses (2) and (3) of subsection (a) shall not apply with respect to the term of office of any member of a local committee elected before January 1, 1986.

(c) If a change in the number of local administrative areas in a county under section 8(b) of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act under the amendment made by subsection (a)(1) of this section will increase the number of the county's—

(1) local administrative areas, and

(2) local committees,

any member of a local committee elected before January 1, 1986, shall serve the unexpired portion of the member's term following such increase as a member of the local committee for the local administrative area in which such member resides.

COUNTY COMMITTEES

SEC. 3. Effective January 1, 1986, the first sentence of the fifth paragraph of section 8(b) of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act (16 U.S.C. 590h(b)) is amended by—

(1) inserting "and as otherwise directed by law with respect to other programs and functions," after "Alaska,"; and

(2) inserting a semicolon and "and the Secretary may utilize the services of such committees in carrying out other programs and functions of the Department of Agriculture" before the period at the end thereof.

SALARY AND TRAVEL EXPENSES

SEC. 4. Effective January 1, 1986, section 388 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938 (7 U.S.C. 1388) is amended by—

(1) adding, at the end of subsection (b), the following: "In addition, the Secretary shall provide compensation for members of such county committees, and to members of local committees of farmers within a county, for work actually performed by such persons in cooperating in carrying out the provisions of such Act; and such persons shall be compensated for such work (1) in the case of persons who are members of local committees within a county, at a rate (per hour of work actually performed) not less than the rate for grade GS-9 in the General Schedule set out in section 5332 of title 5 of the United States Code, as adjusted to an hourly rate; and (2) in the case of persons who are members of county committees, at a rate (per hour of work actually performed) not less than the rate for grade GS-11 in the General Schedule set out in section 5332 of title 5 of the United States Code, as adjusted to an hourly rate."; and

(2) adding, at the end thereof, a new subsection (c) as follows:

"(c) The Secretary shall make payments to members of local, county, and State committees of farmers to cover the expenses for travel incurred by such persons (including, in the case of members of local and county committees, travel between their homes and the local county office of the Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service) in cooperating in carrying out the provisions of the Acts in connection with which such committees are utilized. Such travel expenses shall be paid in the manner authorized, under section 5703 of title 5 of the United States Code, for the payment of expenses and allowances for individuals employed intermittently in the Government service. No part of such travel expense payments may be deducted from the Soil Conservation payments, parity payments, or loans, or other payments under such Acts.".

● Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, those of us who represent States with strong agricultural interests are well acquainted with the agricultural stabilization and conservation committee system. These committees are comprised of men and women who serve their fellow farmers in helping to administer our agricultural programs. Community committees are elected by participating farmers in relatively small subcounty areas, such as townships, where farmers know each other and committee members can respond quickly to individual inquiries. These community committee members elect the members of their ASC county committee which represents all farmers in that county.

In my own State of North Carolina approximately 3,000 dedicated farmers serve on almost 1,000 community committees to make this system work. That figure does not include the 300 others who serve on our county committees. These people are the grassroots organization that helps our agricultural programs stay in touch with the farmer. Without this network all across the country most producers would have no contact with the administration of the programs that affects their livelihoods.

This bill, as amended, will help to ensure that this valuable resource, our ASC committee system, is preserved and strengthened. The bill will accomplish this in several ways. Most importantly, it gives the farmers of a county—through the county committee—a say in how many local community committees there will be in that county. Under the bill, a county committee, by majority vote, may petition the Secretary of Agriculture to change the number of local administrative areas in the county which are represented by a community committee. The Secretary would have to make the changes petitioned by the county committee except that the number of local areas in a county under such a change could not exceed the number of such areas in the county on December 31, 1980. This provision will ensure that there is local support for reducing the number of community committees before such action is taken.

The bill also increases the elected term of service of community committee members from the current 1-year term to a 3-year term. The community committees will benefit from the experience its members will derive during this longer period of service. Furthermore, the 3-year term may encourage more farmers to become involved with the ASC committee system. I understand that the Department of Agriculture estimates that by conducting the elections every 3 years instead of each year, a savings will be realized over current law of approximately $6 million for each year that community committee elections are no longer required.

The bill will also increase the pay scale of members serving on both community and county committees to a level more which closely reflects a reimbursement of the time they spend away from their farm operations at ASC committee meetings. Although most, if not all, of the committeemen I have talked with would gladly serve in their capacity without compensation, the service these farmers render to the Nation is important enough to warrant the minimal expense.

The bill for the first time spells out the duties of the community committees and specifies that they are to meet at least one time each year and such additional times, as directed by the county committee with the approval of the State committee, as may be necessary to carry out their functions. The bill also provides, however, that compensation and travel expenses will not be paid for more than a total of four meetings of the community committees in any year.

Mr. President, the contributions of thousands of men and women who serve on local ASC committees are largely unheralded. Even though they fulfill their responsibilities without fanfare, the farmers of this country know who they are and the unquestioned importance of their work. I am proud to urge the passage of this bill, with the amendment, so that our ASC committee system will continue to remain strong and viable in the future.●

By Mr. GORTON (for himself, Mr. HATFIELD, Mr. HATCH, Mr. MURKOWSKI, Mr. JOHNSTON, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. BAUCUS, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. GARN, Mr. MCCLURE, and Mr. STEVENS):

S. 356. A bill granting the consent of Congress to the Northwest Interstate Compact on Low-level Radioactive Waste Management; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CONGRESSIONAL CONSENT TO THE NORTHWEST INTERSTATE COMPACT ON LOW-LEVEL RADIOACTIVE WASTE MANAGEMENT

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, Senators HATFIELD, HATCH, MURKOWSKI, JOHNSTON, MATSUNAGA, BAUCUS, INOUYE, GARN, MCCLURE, and STEVENS, I am reintroducing legislation to give congressional consent to the Northwest Interstate Compact on Low-Level Radioactive Waste Management. I previously introduced this bill in the 98th Congress, S. 247, and in the 97th Congress, S. 2829. Representative AKAKA from Hawaii is introducing a companion measure today in the House of Representatives.

In 1980, the 96th Congress passed the Low-level Radioactive Waste Policy Act, Public Law 96-573. In that law, Congress declared it to be the policy of the Federal Government that each State be responsible for providing for the availability of capacity for the disposal of low-level radioactive waste generated within its borders. This capacity may exist either within or outside the State. The Congress also declared that low-level radioactive waste can be most safely and efficiently managed on a regional basis. Pursuant to this declared policy, Congress authorized States to enter into interstate compacts in order to provide for the establishment and operation of regional disposal facilities for low-level radioactive waste.

The bill which I reintroduce is the compact which has been developed pursuant to the authority granted by Public Law 96-573 to develop regional compacts. It is the compact negotiated by the following States: Washington, Oregon, Idaho, Montana, Utah, Wyoming, Hawaii, and Alaska. It has been adopted by the legislative action of the States of Washington, Oregon, Idaho, Montana, Utah, Hawaii, and Alaska. The State of Wyoming instead chose to ratify a different compact.

Interstate compacts entered pursuant to the Low-level Radioactive Waste Policy Act of 1980 are required by that law to obtain the consent of Congress. I reintroduce this bill in the 99th Congress in order to obtain that consent.

During the 98th Congress five regional interstate compacts, including the Northwest's, were introduced in the Senate for the purpose of gaining congressional consent. They are the Central, Southeast, Rocky Mountain, and Midwest.

The issue of radioactive waste disposal is an important one for persons residing in the State of Washington. This is so because the Nation's largest low-level radioactive waste disposal facility is located at the Hanford Nuclear Reservation near Richland, WA.

In 1980 voters of the State of Washington passed Initiative 383. The purposes of that initiative were to require Federal-State cooperation in the siting of low-level radioactive waste repositories, and to address the radioactive waste transportation problem with regional responsibility for regionally generated radioactive waste.

The initiative was passed by a majority of over 73 percent of the State's electorate. The proponents argued that the State of Washington should not be responsible to all the other States in the Nation to provide a waste disposal facility for all their low-level radioactive waste. The initiative did not provide for, nor did its proponents advocate, a total exclusion of deposits of out-of-State nuclear waste within the State. Rather, the initiative asserted that management of low-level radioactive waste was safest and most efficient on a regional basis, a policy which is wholly consistent with the statement of Federal policy in Public Law 96-573.

The initiative was subsequently invalidated, first by a U.S. district court and then by the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals. The court ruled that Initiative 383 was unconstitutional because its exclusionary and regulatory provisions violated the supremacy and commerce clauses of the U.S. Constitution.

Nevertheless, Initiative 383 is dedicated to the same ideals as the Low-Level Radioactive Waste Policy Act of 1980. The Washington State Legislature responded to Washingtonians' sense of concern by joining other States of the region in passing the Northwest interstate compact on low-level radioactive waste. States of the Pacific Northwest have negotiated their differences in the best tradition of interstate cooperation, and I encourage Congress to continue that sense of cooperation and responsible management of the Nation's low-level wastes by giving prompt consideration to the bill I introduce today.

Congressional approval of the Northwest compact is crucial to Washingtonians to insure that responsibility for regionally generated radioactive waste becomes a reality. Hanford is currently receiving over 50 percent of the low-level radioactive waste produced in the entire United States, although the State of Washington produces only 4 percent of that total. Approximately 45 percent of all the low-level radioactive waste disposed of at Hanford is generated in the Northeastern United States, which has no existing disposal sites. In other words, over 600,000 cubic feet of low-level radioactive waste per year is currently being transported by truck over 2,500 miles from the Northeastern region to be disposed of in Washington State, and the majority of the States in the Northeast have failed to reach agreement on a regional compact.

Currently, only the States of Washington, Nevada, and South Carolina accept low-level radioactive waste. The State of Nevada has significantly reduced the amount of waste it receives—the site accepted only 1 percent of the Nation's low-level radioactive waste in 1984. Essentially this leaves two States—Washington and South Carolina—with the burden of disposing of waste produced by all 50 States. The fundamental unfairness and inefficiency of this system was made abundantly clear in 1979 when several shipments of leaking wastes and unsafe trucks arrived in Washington State. Due to considerable concern regarding health and safety problems Hanford was temporarily closed that year. The waste site located in Nevada was also closed during that time period leaving only the Barnwell, SC, site as the sole depository for the Nation's low-level radioactive waste.

Developing a responsible regional approach to the resolution of this national problem benefits not only the State of Washington, but the entire Nation. A State-developed system of regional sites would provide greater cost stability, reduce transportation requirements, enhance safety, and provide greater equity among all States.

In addition to giving the Northwest compact prompt consideration, it is also incumbent upon the Congress to evaluate whether the regional interstate compacts which developed across the Nation create an integrated low-level radioactive waste program. All the compacts need not be identical to accomplish this. Indeed, all the compacts need not be before the Congress in order to evaluate whether their combined effect is national in scope. But the compacts must operate in an integrated fashion and not be inconsistent in major interstate or interregion provisions. The reintroduction of the Southeast, Northwest, Central, Rocky Mountain, and Midwest compacts will provide Congress with enough information about an integrated low-level radioactive waste management system to allow congressional consent for these and provide guidance for congressional approval of those subsequently introduced.

In both the 97th and 98th Congresses, the Senate Judiciary Committee held hearings on the Northwest compact bill. Thanks, in large part, to Senator STROM THURMOND, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, consideration of the Northwest compact and other interstate compacts accelerated other regional compacting activity and addressed issues which arose both under Public Law 96-573 and specific compact bills. It is my intention now, upon reintroducing this bill in the 99th Congress, to work aggressively for its passage.

States in the Northwest region have complied in good faith with the Low-Level Radioactive Waste Policy Act of 1980 by developing a compact to manage the low-level waste generated within their region. The bill I reintroduce today allows the party States to refuse to accept for disposal waste generated outside of the region after January 1, 1986, as authorized by the Low-Level Radioactive Waste Policy Act of 1980.

It is time for Congress to approve the Northwest region's efforts to comply with the Federal Government's stated policy and grant party States the authority to exclude waste from outside their region. All compacts which comply with Public Law 96-573 and conform to an integrated national waste program should be approved by Congress, and regions without compacts should explore individually and collectively, and with the assistance of the Congress, alternatives for managing their waste until they acquire a new disposal site.

The State of Washington has cooperated in dealing with the national problem of low-level radioactive waste disposal in an exemplary fashion. In conjunction with the other Northwest States, the State of Washington has responded to Congress' call to establish regional disposal facilities, and I urge Congress to reiterate its support for the Low-Level Radioactive Waste Policy Act of 1980 by giving prompt consideration to this bill.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill and attachment be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 356

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the consent of Congress is hereby given to the States of Alaska, Hawaii, Idaho, Montana, Oregon, Utah, Washington, and Wyoming to enter into the Northwest Interstate Compact on Low-level Radioactive Waste Management, and to each and every part and article thereon. Such compact reads substantially as follows:

"NORTHWEST INTERSTATE COMPACT ON LOW-LEVEL RADIOACTIVE WASTE MANAGEMENT

"ARTICLE I—POLICY AND PURPOSE

"The party states recognize that low-level radioactive wastes are generated by essential activities and services that benefit the citizens of the states. It is further recognized that the protection of the health and safety of the citizens of the party states and the most economical management of low-level radioactive wastes can be accomplished through cooperation of the states in minimizing the amount of handling and transportation required to dispose of such wastes and through the cooperation of the states in providing facilities that serve the region. It is the policy of the party states to undertake the necessary cooperation to protect the health and safety of the citizens of the party states and to provide for the most economical management of low-level radiactive wastes on a continuing basis. It is the purpose of this compact to provide the means for such a cooperative effort among the party states so that the protection of the citizens of the states and the maintenance of the viability of the states' economies will be enhanced while sharing the responsibilities of radioactive low-level waste management.

"ARTICLE II—DEFINITIONS

"As used in this compact:

"(1) 'Facility' means any site, location, structure, or property used or to be used for the storage, treatment, or disposal of low-level waste, excluding federal waste facilities;

"(2) 'Low-level waste' means waste material which contains radioactive nuclides emitting primarily beta or gamma radiation, or both, in concentrations or quantities which exceed applicable federal or state standards for unrestricted release. Low-level waste does not include waste containing more than ten (10) nanocuries of transuranic contaminants per gram of material, nor spent reactor fuel, nor material classified as either high-level waste or waste which is unsuited for disposal by near-surface burial under any applicable federal regulations;

"(3) 'Generator' means any person, partnership, association, corporation, or any other entity whatsoever which, as a part of its activities, produces low-level radioactive waste;

"(4) 'Host state' means a state in which a facility is located.

"ARTICLE III—REGULATORY PRACTICES

"Each party state hereby agrees to adopt practices which will require low-level waste shipments originating within its borders and destined for a facility within another party state to conform to the applicable packaging and transportation requirements and regulations of the host state. Such practices shall include:

"(1) Maintaining an inventory of all generators within the state that have shipped or expect to ship low-level waste to facilities in another party state;

"(2) Periodic unannounced inspection of the premises of such generators and the waste management activities thereon;

"(3) Authorization of the containers in which such waste may be shipped, and a requirement that generators use only that type of container authorized by the state;

"(4) Assurance that inspection of the carriers which transport such waste are conducted by proper authorities, and appropriate enforcement action taken for violations;

"(5) After receiving notification from a host state that a generator within the party state is in violation of applicable packaging or transportation standards, the party state will take appropriate action to assure that such violations do not recur. Such action may include inspection of every individual low-level waste shipment by that generator.

"Each party state may impose fees upon generators and shippers to recover the cost of the inspections and other practices under this article. Nothing in this article shall be construed to limit any party state's authority to impose additional or more stringent standards on generators or carriers than those required under this article.

"ARTICLE IV—REGIONAL FACILITIES

"(1) Facilities located in any party state, other than facilities established or maintained by individual low-level waste generators for the management of their own low-level waste, shall accept low-level waste generated in any party state if such waste has been packaged and transported according to applicable laws and regulations.

"(2) No facility located in any party state may accept low-level waste generated outside of the region comprised of the party states, except as provided in article V.

"(3) Until such time as paragraph (2) of article IV takes effect, facilities located in any party state may accept low-level waste generated outside of any of the party states only if such waste is accompanied by a certificate of compliance issued by an official of the state in which such waste shipment originated. Such certificate shall be in such form as may be required by the host state, and shall contain at least the following:

"(A) The generator's name and address;

"(B) A description of the contents of the low-level waste container;

"(C) A statement that the low-level waste being shipped has been inspected by the official who issued the certificate or by his agent or by a representative of the United States Nuclear Regulatory Commission, and found to have been packaged in compliance with applicable Federal regulations and such additional requirements as may be imposed by the host state;

"(D) A binding agreement by the state of origin to reimburse any party state for any liability or expense incurred as a result of an accidental release of such waste during shipment or after such waste reaches the facility.

"(4) Each party state shall cooperate with the other party states in determining the appropriate site of any facility that might be required within the region comprised of the party states, in order to maximize public health and safety while minimizing the use of any one (1) party state as the host of such facilities on a permanent basis. Each party state further agrees that decisions regarding low-level waste management facilities in their region will be reached through a good faith process which takes into account the burdens borne by each of the party states as well as the benefits each has received.

"(5) The party states recognize that the issue of hazardous chemical waste management is similar in many respects to that of low-level waste management. Therefore, in consideration of the State of Washington allowing access to its low-level waste disposal facility by generators in other party states, party states such as Oregon and Idaho which host hazardous chemical waste disposal facilities will allow access to such facilities by generators within other party states. Nothing in this compact shall be construed to prevent any party state from limiting the nature and type of hazardous chemical or low-level wastes to be accepted at facilities within its borders or from ordering the closure of such facilities, so long as such action by a host state is applied equally to all generators within the region comprised of the party states.

"(6) Any host state may establish a schedule of fees and requirements related to its facility, to assure that closure, perpetual care, and maintenance and contingency requirements are met, including adequate bonding.

"ARTICLE V—NORTHWEST LOW-LEVEL WASTE COMPACT COMMITTEE

"The governor of each party state shall designate one (1) official of that state as the person responsible for administration of this compact. The officials so designated shall together comprise the northwest low-level waste compact committee. The committee shall meet as required to consider matters arising under this compact. The parties shall inform the committee of existing regulations concerning low-level waste management in their states, and shall afford all parties a reasonable opportunity to review and comment upon any proposed modifications in such regulations. Notwithstanding any provision of article IV to the contrary, the committee may enter into arrangements with states, provinces, individual generators, or regional compact entities outside the region comprised of the party states for access to facilities on such terms and conditions as the committee may deem appropriate. However, it shall require a two-thirds (⅔) vote of all such members, including the affirmative vote of the member of any party state in which a facility affected by such arrangement is located, for the committee to enter into such arrangement.

"ARTICLE VI—ELIGIBLE PARTIES AND EFFECTIVE DATE

"(1) Each of the following states is eligible to become a party to this compact: Alaska, Hawaii, Idaho, Montana, Oregon, Utah, Washington, and Wyoming. As to any eligible party, this compact shall become effective upon enactment into law by that party, but it shall not become initially effective until enacted into law by two (2) states. Any party state may withdraw from this compact by enacting a statute repealing its approval.

"(2) After the compact has initially taken effect pursuant to paragraph (1) of this article, any eligible party state may become a party to this compact by the execution of an executive order by the governor of the state. Any state which becomes a party in this manner shall cease to be a party upon the final adjournment of the next general or regular session of its legislature or July 1, 1983, whichever occurs first, unless the compact has by then been enacted as a statute by that state.

"(3) Paragraph (2) of article IV of this compact shall take effect on July 1, 1983, if consent is given by Congress. As provided in public law 96-573, Congress may withdraw its consent to the compact after every five (5) year period.

"ARTICLE VII—SEVERABILITY

"If any provision of this compact, or its application to any person or circumstances, is held to be invalid, all other provisions of this compact, and the application of all of its provisions to all other persons and circumstances, shall remain valid; and to this end the provisions of this compact are severable.".

SEC. 2. Congress finds that the compact consented to herein is in furtherance of the policy contained in section 4(a)(1) of the Low-level Radioactive Waste Policy Act of 1980 and with the intent of Section 274(b) of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954. In order that this compact may be given full effect, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission is authorized and directed to require licensees subject to its jurisdiction under the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 to comply with the provisions of this compact. The Commission shall consult and cooperate with the states which are parties to this compact in carrying out this section.

SEC. 3. The Consent of Congress granted pursuant to this act is limited by the following conditions:

(a) Notwithstanding the provisions of Article V and Article VI. Paragraph (3) of the Northwest Interstate Compact on Low-Level Radioactive Waste Management, Article IV, paragraph (2) of that compact shall not take effect until January 1, 1986.

(b) The right of Congress to alter, amend, or repeal this Act is hereby expressly reserved.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, it is a pleasure to join with my colleagues today in cosponsoring the Northwest Interstate Compact on Low-Level Radioactive Waste Management.

The problem of managing and disposing low-level radioactive wastes is something that must be solved and done so quickly. In Oregon many schools and hospitals produce low-level radioactive wastes that have to be disposed of in a safe and efficient manner. Oregon's only nuclear power generating system, Trojan, located at Rainier, also produces quantities of these radioactive wastes. This compact, which has gone through a great deal of discussion in the effected States deserves to be ratified by Congress. This compact is a good faith effort in recognizing a serious problem, and working out a framework to begin negotiating a suitable low-level radioactive waste disposal site.

Mr. President, this legislation is critical to my State and to other States in the West that have joined in the compact as authorized by Public Law 96-573. It is my hope that the Senate can expeditiously move to ratify this important compact during this session of Congress.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleagues in cosponsorship of the Northwest Interstate Compact on Low-Level Radioactive Waste Management. It is my greatest hope that the Congress, with patience, perseverance, and farsightedness, will ratify this, as well as all, regional low-level waste compacts this year in a manner that reflects the original intent of the 1980 Low-Level Radioactive Waste Policy Act: That is, to assign responsibility for disposal of such waste to the States, via the formation, ratification, and implementation of regional compact agreements.

Mr. President, the clock is running out on this issue. Since passage of the Low-Level Radioactive Waste Policy Act in 1980, we have seen several attempts to successfully ratify the regional compacts in Congress. Yet, in each case, Congress has adjourned without final resolution of the key issues needed for ratification. Such vacillation on the part of the Congress and the regions was anticipated by the original authors of the act, whose provisions were carefully structured to encourage diligence with respect to the timeframe and structure of the act. I for one would much prefer to work toward realizable solutions now, rather than let the hourglass drain and the structure crumble.

No one will deny the fact that there are several serious and substantial issues that must be resolved to the satisfaction of all States before congressional ratification of the compacts can proceed to a successful conclusion. Some of these issues are of a technical or regulatory nature, and can be resolved in a relatively simple, straightforward manner. Other issues, however, including interregional agreements and post-1985 access provision, will require a great deal more deliberation and ingenuity in order to reach an acceptable, workable compromise.

I firmly believe, as I am sure my colleagues do, that the best and most expedient manner in which to address these seemingly insurmountable issues is through open and constructive dialog among the various States and regions, as well as close State and regional association with the congressional committees having jurisdiction over the compacts. I am confident that, by working together in such a manner, we will be able to reach a consensus that is fair and reasonable to all parties. I am prepared to help the Congress—and in particular, the Senate Judiciary Committee—in any way I can to seek such a final resolution by the end of this calendar year. For if we do not succeed this year, the Congress will be faced with a far greater task in 1986, and with far less likelihood that the end result will be as palatable to the States or to the Nation, compared to what is so near at hand right now.

Our country and our people reap a tremendous benefit from the many peaceful applications of nuclear technology: Radiochemistry, cancer therapy, and nuclear power generation, just to name a few. It would indeed be an inexcusable hardship that our citizens would have to bear should these benefits have to be sacrificed even temporarily for want of adequate low-level waste disposal capabilities.

And so, Mr. President, it behooves us all to accept and share in the responsibility for low-level radioactive waste disposal in a manner that is equitable to all. To turn our backs on this responsibility now would not remove the problem, but would merely postpone and exacerbate it. I say let us get on with it now, while time is still on our side.

S. 358 A bill entitled the "Part B Prevention Incentive Act"; to the Committee on Finance.

S. 359. A bill to provide for medical demonstrations in health promotion and disease prevention; to the Committee on Finance.

MEDICARE HEALTH PROMOTION AND DISEASE PREVENTION LEGISLATION

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, 1 month ago today, I kicked the habit. I put down my tobacco pipes for the last time and resolved not to smoke them again. It was not an easy decision, but for me it was a necessary one.

I am an advocate for consumer choice reform in health care. I have argued that people should be provided incentives to stay healthy and to choose among competitive health plans which assure them cost-effective and quality sick care. It is up to us as consumers to buy right in the marketplace.

However, consumer choice is more than choosing better sick care. It means first that we all take greater responsibility for our own health. Health plan buyers should be financially encouraged to reduce their risk of illness and be made to contribute more if they choose to increase their sick care consumption risk through smoking or other obviously dangerous habits.

Up until now the elderly and disabled received automatic entry into the Medicare Hospital Reimbursement Program and, by election, into a similar Medicare physician plan. But change is on the way. Choice in the purchase of a health plan is now being offered to Medicare beneficiaries. As of February, Medicare beneficiaries will have an opportunity to choose a health maintenance organization or competitive medical plan option. Through promoting choice, this significant reform will in time reduce Medicare Program costs and I believe increase beneficiary access to quality services.

Personal choice about lifestyle is important. Incentives to promote self-responsibility should also be incorporated in the Medicare Program. So on this, my first month's anniversary off the pipe, I thought it a particularly appropriate time to propose a package of measures for Medicare which would encourage health promotion and disease prevention for seniors.

The purpose of the package is to provide incentives for seniors to both take it upon themselves to reduce risk of illness and lay a base for restructuring Medicare to meet its full potential as a health as well as a sickness program. Since 1965 Medicare has, appropriately, been from its establishment an acute care program. However, as research now and recent experience have graphically shown, not only can costs and lives be saved by better prevention but the risk of chronic disabilities which frequently prey on the elderly, can be reduced. It is time to explore the many ways Medicare can be restructured to incorporate the possibilities of prevention.

MEDICARE PART B PREMIUMS NONSMOKING DISCOUNT

The National Center for Health Statistics reported in 1980 that 17.9 percent of men over 65 and 16.8 percent of women over 65 smoked. It has been projected that about 5 million seniors smoke today. Surgeon Generals since the sixties and studies too numerous to mention have indicated these smokers are at greater risk of disability and fatal illness than nonsmokers. As the noted gerontologist, Anne Somers has argued, "The time has passed when the American taxpayer can promise full coverage of health benefits to the victims of known self-destructive behavior without asking for a contribution from them."

The private sector is already taking the lead in rewarding those who choose to avoid smoking which unquestionably increases the risk of illness. The American Council on Life Insurance Co. reports that over 80 percent of life insurance companies now offer premium discounts to nonsmokers.

The National Association of Insurance Commissioners is also taking positive steps in this direction. The organization has adopted a resolution encouraging the health insurance industry to offer financial incentives to insureds who have healthy lifestyles. Risk factors the insurance commissioners encourage the health insurers to recognize include use of tobacco, excessive weight, and high blood pressure.

Many Blue Cross and Blue Shield plans around the country have already adopted nonsmoker discounts for their health plans. Blue plans have offered discounts for nonsmokers in California, Idaho, and Roanoke, VA.

The Blue plan in my home State of Minnesota has also just introduced a nonsmoker discount. Under the plan's program, a 30- to 34-year-old nonsmoker now paying $19.69 a month for health coverage with a $500 deductible would receive a discount of $1.35, or nearly 7 percent. A 60- to 65-year-old nonsmoker would receive a discount of nearly 22 percent or $16.02 of a $74.31 monthly policy.

It is time for Medicare to move in this direction. Nonsmokers should be rewarded and smokers asked to pay more of the tab. Smokers are at greater risk for a host of chronic illnesses—cancers, respiratory ailments, and heart disease.

Under my bill, the Medicare Part B Premiums Act, S. 357, the part B premium would be raised on January 1, 1986, to $17.60 for smokers. Nonsmokers would receive a $1 discount.

A recent article by Cindy L. Jajich and others which appeared in the Journal of the American Medical Association showed that smokers in the 65-to-74 age group, for their sample, had a risk of death from coronary heart disease 52 percent higher than nonsmokers, ex-smokers. This research indicated that even ex-smokers of cigarettes, pipes, and cigars who had smoked for years, had no higher death rate than those who never smoked. Clearly, when seniors kick the habit it can make a positive contribution to their health and the health bill of the Nation.

PART B PREVENTION INCENTIVE ACT

The current administration and some of my colleagues would like to raise the Medicare part B premium from $75 to $100. Most private insurers now have at least a $100 deductible and many are instituting deductibles of $250 or $500 for the health plans they sell. Medicare part B has had a $75 deductible since 1982, while program costs increased by about 25 percent. So there is a strong argument for those who want us to go to $100 for the part B deductible. If we are going to $100, why not do it in such a way that it will do some good for the beneficiaries.

It is important that we begin to incorporate in the Medicare Program incentives to promote disease prevention for seniors. This bill will raise the part B deductible from $75 to $100, but, in exchange, allow costs incurred for certain preventive health measures incurred by beneficiaries to be counted toward satisfying the deductible.

Health measures eligible for the deductible would include health screening, to be defined by the Secretary of Health and Human Services; immunization, not otherwise covered by Medicare; and prescription drugs for the control and treatment of hypertension.

This new allowance under part B of Medicare will provide an incentive for Medicare beneficiaries to seek preventive services. Experience has indicated those beneficiaries who take advantage of this option increase the likelihood of improving their health, reducing health costs, and lowering the risk to them of disability and death.

Health screening is particularly important for the elderly. Health screening, for example, will identify those services with high blood pressure. Seniors are particularly at risk of stroke. It is estimated that 135,000 individuals that are over the age of 65 die each year of stroke yet more than half a million survive but become disabled from stroke.

Over the last 16 years death rates from stroke have declined by 45 percent. The greater part of this decrease has occurred since 1972 when the Federal Government's National Heart, Lung and Blood Institute began its National High Blood Pressure Education Program. This NIH program has been successful because it promoted identification of those at risk and high blood pressure control. It is time Medicare policy is redirected to better effort.

MEDICARE DEMONSTRATIONS IN HEALTH PROMOTION AND DISEASE PREVENTION

This final bill in the package instructs the Secretary of Health and Human Services to fund five demonstration projects designed to reduce the risk of disability and death of Medicare beneficiaries through the provision of preventive health services. These demonstrations would encompass an array of services including those in the previous bill as well as such items as health risk appraisals, dietary consultation, stress reductions, exercise counseling and programs, smoking cessation, sleep regulation targeted mental health intervention, prevention of injury, instruction in self-medication, and prevention of substance abuse. These demonstrations would allow for the thorough testing of efficacy of such activities.

We know from the success of ON LOK Health Services Program that comparable measures can improve the lives of seniors eligible for institutional care and reduce the costs of expensive hospital use. These demonstrations will help determine whether or not preventive measures aimed at identifying and meeting the health concerns of the "at risk" elderly can produce the same positive results.

The demonstrations can provide direction to Congress concerning the potential usefulness of adapting preventive benefits to the Medicare Program. They can also provide important knowledge on preventive approaches to the health care providers who offer service to the elderly. It is, therefore, vital these programs be strictly monitored and evaluated and that results be reported to Congress in a timely manner as outlined in the bill. To assure appropriate evaluation, the bill calls for oversight and evaluation of these programs by relevant experts from this Nation's schools of public health.

It is my hope that these bills will encourage additional discussion among health care policymakers, professionals, and insurers concerning health promotion and disease prevention. As a nation, we need to focus more of our efforts and resources to the area of prevention both to reduce health care costs and improve the quality of life of all Americans.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the three bills be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bills were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. ZORINSKY:

S. 360. A bill to direct the Secretary of Agriculture to convey, without consideration, to the Nebraska Game and Parks Commission, approximately 160 acres of land within the Nebraska National Forest to be used for the purposes of expanding the Chadron State Park, NE; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

NEBRASKA LAND TRANSFER

Mr. ZORINSKY. Mr. President, today I am introducing a bill which would transfer approximately 160 acres of land within the Nebraska National Forest to the Nebraska Game and Parks Commission to be utilized in adding camping facilities and nature trails—hiking and horseback riding—to the Chadron State Park.

The land involved is bordered on two sides by the Chadron State Park and is therefore contiguous to the State park. The use of this land would be upgraded and all improvements of course would be provided by the State of Nebraska.

The bill is the only solution to a longstanding problem of inadequate camping facilities at Chadron State Park. The park attracts some 200,000 visitors a year, but it has no campground and no land suitable for campground development. As a result, camping occurs randomly near the park entrance.

Transfer of the land would greatly enhance public use of Chadron State Park and we simply have no other alternative for developing camping facilities at the park.

The bill protects the Federal Government's rights to oil and gas and other subsurface interests. In addition, the bill also provides that in the event the Nebraska Game and Parks Commission shall fail to utilize the land as a part of Chadron State Park, the land shall revest in the U.S. Forest Service.

I ask for the support of my colleagues on this bill, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 360

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) no later than the one hundred and eighty days following the date of enactment of this Act and subject to the provisions of subsection (b), the Secretary of Agriculture shall convey, without consideration, to the Nebraska Game and Parks Commission, all right, title, and interest of the United States in the real property described in subsection (c).

(b) The Secretary of Agriculture shall reserve for the United States any subsurface rights that the United States owns in the real property conveyed under this Act including oil and gas rights. The Secretary shall provide that title in such real property shall revest in the United States upon failure of the Nebraska Game and Parks Commission to use the land as part of the Chadron State Park, Nebraska.

(c) The land referred to in subsection (a) consists of approximately 160 acres within the Nebraska National Forest and is described as follows:

The east half of the southwest quarter, the west half of the southeast quarter, and that part of the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter lying west of State Highway 385, of Section 25, Township 32 North, Range 49 West, 5th Principle Meridian, Dawes County, Nebraska.

S. 361. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to make permanent the deduction for charitable contributions by nonitemizers; to the Committee on Finance.

DEDUCTION FOR CHARITABLE CONTRIBUTIONS BY NONITEMIZERS

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise today to offer legislation to make permanent the provision of the tax law that permits every American taxpayer, whether or not he or she itemizes his or her deductions, to deduct charitable contributions.

This provision, introduced in 1981 by myself and the distinguished chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, Senator PACKWOOD, gives taxpayers who do not itemize their deductions the same right to deduct their charitable contributions as those who do itemize. It was then considered worthwhile and responsible legislation, overwhelmingly approved by Congress, and remains so today. Under this law, nonitemizers could deduct 25 percent of their charitable contributions, up to $100, in the 1982 and 1983 tax years; and from that point the amounts and percentages rose at a gradual rate. In 1984, nonitemizing taxpayers can deduct 25 percent of their charitable contributions up to $300; and under the law this year, the percentage will rise to 50 percent with no upper limit. In 1986, next year, nonitemizers will be able to deduct all of their charitable contributions—just as can taxpayers who do itemize the other deductions.

The need—even the duty, as Thomas Jefferson put it in 1806—to support charities is a well-recognized public purpose. In 1981, when this provision was enacted, we attached a sunset provision, eliminating the right in 1987. In 5 years, we reasoned, we could see if this provision served the public purpose. It has, and now the sunset should be eliminated.

Charles T. Clotfelter, vice provost of Duke University and a distinguished expert on charitable giving, has estimated that the above-the-line deduction for charitable contributions will produce some $3.8 to $6.5 billion in additional charitable giving in 1986. The deduction for nonitemizers is responsible today for 10 full percent of all charitable donations, and permitting this important provision of the Tax Code to sunset would, in effect, drastically cut the budgets of all of our voluntary and not-for-profit organizations that today provide essential services in our communities.

Our Nation has a long history of prudent caution about unnecessary Government intervention in the affairs of our society. We prize independent collective actions and responses, precisely of the kind supported by the deduction for charitable contributions. The elaborate American network of charitable organizations enables us to address pressing problems of disease and deprivation, and to support cultural enrichment through universities, museums, and libraries—all without direct Government involvement.

Why, then, limit the incentives for charitable giving to the minority of 35 percent of Americans who itemize their tax returns? It is Americans earning less than $50,000—those less likely to itemize their tax returns—who are responsible for most individual charitable giving. Is it reasonable to encourage charitable contributions only among certain Americans, and discourage giving by others? The purpose of the above-the-line deduction is the same as for the itemized deduction, to increase charitable giving. And as Professor Clotfelter points out, the above-the-line deduction, like the itemized one, has achieved this end.

Mr. President, I first came to Washington with the administration of John Fitzgerald Kennedy. I, like millions of Americans and many in this Chamber, recall his State of the Union Address in January 1962, when President Kennedy spoke of our national resolve to better the lives of all American citizens:

> A strong America cannot neglect the aspirations of its citizens—the welfare of the needy, the health care of the elderly, the education of the young. For we are not developing the nation's wealth for its own sake. Wealth is the means and people are the ends.

Could we do better, in our effort to live up to John Kennedy's vision of us, than to support all our charitable and nonprofit organizations? The above-the-line charitable deduction should be a permanent part of our Tax Code not only because it encourages Americans to support worthy causes, but also because it makes available to all Americans the same incentives for charitable giving, regardless of income.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to support this legislation, and I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill appear in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That subsection (i) of section 170 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to the rule of nonitemization of deductions) is amended by striking out paragraph (4).●

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I am pleased to join as an original cosponsor of legislation to make permanent the deduction for charitable contributions by nonitemizers now scheduled to sunset on December 31, 1986. I believe this legislation, introduced by my distinguished colleague, the senior Senator from New York, is crucial to assure the continued viability of philanthropic, humanitarian, and cultural organizations. This legislation is made even more timely by the Treasury tax reform proposal, which would repeal the deduction for charitable contributions made by nonitemizers.

As part of the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981 [ERTA], Congress established a 5-year phase-in of this deduction by nonitemizers. I believe this was responsible tax policy. In 1982 and 1983, nonitemizers could deduct 25 percent of their charitable contributions up to $100. In 1984, the deduction rose to 25 percent of contributions up to $300. It increases to 50 percent of total contributions in 1985. Finally, in 1986, 100 percent of all contributions will be deductible by nonitemizers. However, for tax year 1987, the deduction is completely repealed.

The charitable deduction for nonitemizers is estimated to lose $5.7 billion in tax revenue when 100 percent of all contributions can be deducted. This is in stark contrast to estimates by the Urban Institute of $25 billion less Federal funding of these same organizations. Clearly, charitable institutions are experiencing a funding shortfall. With the sunset of December 31, 1986, for charitable deductions by nonitemizers, the financial difficulties of charities will be further exacerbated.

Eliminating the sunset provision would effectively reduce the financial burden felt by these worthy groups. This is consistent with the administration's goal of encouraging private sector funding of private nonprofit activities.

The Federal funding crisis aside, private giving to charities has been sharply reduced as of late. The recession has constrained an individual's ability to contribute to worthy causes. With the recovery gaining strength, this trend hopefully will be reversed. However, changes in the tax structure mandated in ERTA will permanently reduce giving to charities by certain economic groups. By dropping the maximum individual tax bracket from 70 to 50 percent, the wealthy have less of an incentive to give. Consequently, some individuals in the highest tax bracket will reduce their contributions.

Mr. President, I am not suggesting that the maximum individual tax rate be increased. Rather, I am supporting adoption of the legislation introduced by Senator MOYNIHAN as a means of partially replacing Federal cutbacks and less giving by the affluent. The legislation is designed specifically to encourage middle class participation in charitable giving. Approximately 67 percent of all taxpayers do not itemize. Without the deduction for charitable contributions by nonitemizers, the middle class will have no monetary incentive to give.

The charities of our society are a precious natural resource in need of further development. This legislation will ease the financial stress felt by the Nation's humanitarian and cultural organizations. I am proud to be an original cosponsor of this legislation and I urge its enactment.●

By Mr. HELMS (for himself and Mr. EAST):

S. 362. A bill to authorize the use of certain lands in connection with the project at Manteo (Shallowbag) Bay, NC; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

OREGON INLET

● Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, Senator East and I are introducing legislation to address a serious problem in North Carolina—the future of Oregon Inlet as a safe navigable channel for commercial and recreational vessels; and most important of all, the future of many people who live in and around Dare County, NC, and who depend on the local fishing industry for their livelihoods.

Oregon Inlet is in Dare County, along the Outer Banks. Mr. President, those who haven't visited the Outer Banks have missed a great joy. It is one of the most beautiful areas of the country, with some of the best fishing to be found anywhere.

Oregon Inlet is the only inlet along the Outer Banks from Norfolk—more than 90 miles to the north—and Hatteras Inlet—roughly 45 miles to the south. Oregon Inlet is therefore a potential haven for all kinds of oceangoing vessels in bad weather. And when the weather is bad along the Outer Banks things can get pretty rough. You have got to be hardy to live there year-round, and you have to be particularly hardy—and brave—to sail through Oregon Inlet every day in search of your livelihood.

Wanchese Harbor, which is on the back side of the Outer Banks sheltered from the Atlantic Ocean, houses a commercial fishing fleet. The only access to Wanchese Harbor is through Oregon Inlet.

The age-old problem there, and the problem Senator EAST's and my bill seeks to remedy, is serious shoaling in the inlet itself. There is often too little water in the channel for the fishing boats to pass safely. At such times, the captains must take their boats to other ports, which are many miles away. This costs them dearly in time and money—sometimes making a catch unprofitable. Often the captains risk making it through the inlet. Sometimes they make it, and sometimes they do not.

In 1970, in section 101 of the River and Harbor Act of 1970, Congress authorized the Manteo (Shallowbag) Bay project, which provides for the stabilization of Oregon Inlet with dual jetties and facilities for sand transfer. Despite this authorization, however, jetties have never been built. When the project was authorized, all Federal agencies involved, including the Department of the Interior, the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, and the Department of Transportation, as well as the Corps of Engineers were in favor of the project.

Unfortunately, the authorization did not contain a specific grant of authority to the Department of the Interior to make available to the Corps of Engineers the land necessary for jetty construction.

I refer, of course, to land to the north of Oregon Inlet—the Cape Hatteras National Seashore—and land to the south—the Pea Island National Wildlife Refuge. These lands are under the jurisdiction of the Department of Interior, and cannot be released without authority.

Omission of this grant of authority has caused great hardship for those who depend on the channel for their livelihoods, and has led to one of the most ridiculous and time-consuming bureaucratic hassles I have ever witnessed.

Repeated attempts to get the Department of the Interior to issue permits for jetty construction have proven unsuccessful. Interior's lawyers have concluded they have no authority in law to issue the necessary permits. I have accepted the lawyers' interpretation of the law, and that is why Senator EAST and I are introducing this legislation today.

Our bill would simply authorize the Corps of Engineers to use land within the boundaries of the Cape Hatteras National Seashore and land within the boundaries of the Pea Island National Wildlife Refuge to carry out the project at Manteo (Shallowbag) Bay, NC.

This is the same bill that passed the House of Representatives during the 98th Congress due to the good efforts of Congressman WALTER JONES and then Congressman—now Governor—Jim Martin. Congressman JONES and I, and Senator EAST and Governor Martin have been working together, and have solicited and received the support of the Governor of our State and other interested officials and citizens, to see this project through.

I should mention that this bill does not authorize the expenditure of any funds—it simply settles the question of authority to use certain land for jetty construction.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that its text be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 362

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary of the Army, acting through the Chief of Engineers, is authorized to use land within the boundaries of the Cape Hatteras National Seashore and land within the boundaries of the Pea Island National Wildlife Refuge which he determines to be necessary to carry out the project at Manteo (Shallowbag) Bay, North Carolina, authorized by section 101 of the River and Harbor Act of 1970.●

● Mr. EAST. Mr. President, I am honored to join as a cosponsor of this legislation offered by the senior Senator from North Carolina, Senator HELMS. This legislation would authorize the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers to utilize lands under the jurisdiction of the U.S. Department of the Interior for the purpose of anchoring jetties at Oregon Inlet.

The legislation has my full support. It would allow for the completion of the Manteo (Shallowbag) Bay project, authorized under the River and Harbor Act of 1970 as a navigational project. That enabling legislation specifically identified the construction of jetties as the means by which the inlet would be stabilized. In keeping with the congressional mandate, the Congress has authorized, over a period of years, $15 million for the construction of jetties. The project is of major importance to the economic advancement of northeastern North Carolina and to the lives and well-being of the fishing crews who work the stormy ocean area nearby.

The good people on the Outer Banks of North Carolina have too long endured delays in the completion of the Manteo (Shallowbag) Bay project. The State of North Carolina and local interests in the Oregon Inlet vicinity wish to support and expand our domestic fishing industry. This legislation, by resolving the land issue once and forever, would permit the stabilization of Oregon Inlet and allow safe passage through the channel. The impact on our domestic fishing industry would be enormous.

Mr. President, if we are to continue to be responsive to the water resource needs of present and future generations, we ought to aim to improve navigational facilities to allow our fishing vessels safe passage. To this effort I commend this legislation to my colleagues.

I urge my colleagues to support this legislation. It provides for the vital use of lands important to the development of a safe and stable navigation channel.●

S. 364. A bill for the relief of Shailesh K. Patel and Premlata Patel; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

FOR THE RELIEF OF THE PATELS

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce a private immigration relief bill on behalf of Shailesh Patel and his wife, Premlata.

Shailesh Patel has lived in this country for 18 years, since leaving India. His wife, Premlata, has been here for 13 years. They have three young children who attend school here and have made close friends.

The Patel family have been good members of the community. The children have absolutely no familiarity with India, cannot speak their parents' dialect, and cannot possibly succeed in school there. Mr. Patel is well liked in his community and has operated a successful service station for many years.

I have taken the time and had occasion to visit the Patels in their home in suburban Philadelphia, a beautiful home, indicative to the contribution which they have made to this country. I have visited Mr. Patel's service station and can personally attest to the fact that Mr. Patel is a productive, law-abiding citizen.

The Patels will be faced with a deportation order under which they will be forced to return to India. Their American dream will be brought to an abrupt and painful end if that deportation order is carried out.

The forced exclusion of such hard-working, conscientious, and community-spirited people is certainly not what our immigration laws were designed to accomplish. This is certainly the case when their effect is to permanently disrupt the lives of young, American-born children. By virtue of their long residence in the United States and their American citizen children, the Patels meet the criteria I proposed last Congress in my legislation entitled the "Alien Parental Amnesty Act."

Through hard work and initiative, Shailesh Patel and his wife have come far toward realizing their ambition, and in doing so, have enriched the lives of their community and the United States.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 364

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, notwithstanding paragraph (14) of section 212(a) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, for purposes of such Act, Shailesh K. Patel and Premlata Patel shall be held and considered to have been lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent residence as of the date of the enactment of this Act upon payment of the required visa fees. Upon the granting of permanent residence to such aliens as provided for in this Act, the Secretary of State shall instruct the proper officer to reduce by the proper number, during the current fiscal year or the fiscal year next following, the total number of immigrant visas which are made available under section 203(a) of the Immigration and Nationality Act to natives of the countries in which the aliens were born or, if applicable, the total number of immigrant visas which are made available under section 202 of such Act to natives of the countries in which the aliens were born.

S. 365. A bill for the relief of Doctor Pablo Esguerra, Theresa Esguerra, and Micheline Esguerra; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

FOR THE RELIEF OF THE ESGUERRAS

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce a private immigration relief bill on behalf of Dr. Pablo Esquerra, his wife Theresa, and his 10-year-old daughter, Micheline.

Dr. Esguerra has been in the United States continuously since 1975. He has an American-born son, Francis, age 6, who is an American citizen and therefore not technically subject to deportation. However, as a practical matter, he will be forced to join his parents and sister if they are deported to the Philippines.

Based on inquiries, I am reliably advised as follows:

Dr. Esquerra is liked and respected in his community in Fayette County, PA, where he is a member of the emergency room staffs of the Green County and Uniontown Hospitals. Dr. Esguerra also works at the D.W. Allen Memorial Clinic, an institution that provides desperately needed medical services to the residents of small communities outlying the Uniontown, PA, area. Nearly 100 patients, many of them senior citizens, look to Dr. Esquerra for their medical care.

As a productive, valued member of his community, residing within the United States for more than 9 years and, most importantly, with an American-born child, Dr. Esguerra meets the criteria I proposed in the last Congress in my legislation entitled the "Alien Parental Amnesty Act." This situation bears close resemblance to that of Shailesh Patel, on whose behalf I have also reintroduced a private bill. Deportation of Mr. Patel or Dr. Esguerra would work a grievious hardship on their young, American-born children, while penalizing the communities that have come to value highly their contributions.

It is in the interest of all Americans to have such talented, community-spirited individuals join us as citizens.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill be reprinted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 366. A bill to authorize the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers to construct various projects for improvement to rivers and harbors of the United States, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

WATER RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT ACT

● Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. President, I am very pleased to join with 22 of my colleagues today in introducing this omnibus water resources legislation. If this bill looks familiar to many of my colleagues, it ought to: It is the exact text of the amendment which Senators STAFFORD, RANDOLPH, MOYNIHAN, and myself offered to the continuing resolution toward the end of the 98th Congress.

But it should look familiar to many for a more important reason: The Committee on Environment and Public Works has been working on this legislation for 4 years. Throughout that period we have tried to involve Members of this body in reaching compromises necessary to enact fiscally responsible and fair legislation which can break the deadlock on water projects. This legislation is a result of that work.

The word "compromise" is key here, because the policy reforms in this bill balance competing views of water resource development. The bill is a compromise between those who would like to have their favorite water projects constructed under traditional cost sharing and those who believe that local project sponsors should pay a greater share of project costs. It is also inherently a compromise between big ports and little ports; between the railroads and the inland waterway interests; between the shippers of grain and coal and the shippers of containerized cargo; and between the people who don't like any water projects and those of us who feel that if planned properly they are an essential tool for improving the quality of life and the economy of this Nation.

There can be no absolute winners in these or any of the other disputes which surround any omnibus water resources legislation. There must be compromises or there can and will be no water resources legislation in the 99th Congress; I can guarantee that as a fact.

I am sure that there is no Member of this body who is comfortable with every position in this bill. Some of my colleagues who have cosponsored this legislation may have concerns with certain provisions. But we all realize that the day must come when Congress must decide on the Federal Government's role in constructing and maintaining our water resources infrastructure. That decision will be painful but it must be made soon because the cities and communities, the private individuals, and the businesses which we represent all suffer from our inability to collectively make tough choices.

To my colleagues who believe the cost sharing in this legislation is too tough, let me just say that the administration will soon send to Congress its own water resources legislation that will curl your toes. The details of that legislation aren't important to know at this point. Its existence is just one more piece of evidence to the effect that the administration is serious about cutting the Federal deficit, and, for better or for worse, they perceive greatly reduced Federal expenditures on water resources as one way to help reach that goal. I have no doubt that is we send the President a bill with cost sharing provisions weaker than those in this bill, he will veto it.

So, we must have legislation that revives our water resources programs without adding to our serious deficit problems. Yet, it must do these things without adding an unbearable or unfair burden on the States, the cities, or other entities who must be required to financially participate in project construction.

Mr. President, having said these things, let me now outline how this bill reforms existing Corps of Engineers water policy and programs in such a way as to guarantee that its passage will not result in increased budget deficits.

First and foremost, Mr. President, title I caps the Corps of Engineers annual construction obligations at levels closely approximating the CBO projections for the next 5 years. We will examine these figures again in committee to ensure that they reflect today's budget projections.

Therefore, no matter how many projects or programs are in the bill, there is little if any impact on the budget.

I am continually asked, "How much does this bill cost?" or "Is it as big as the House bill?" Let me say that these questions are meaningless in the context of the title I construction obligation cap.

This is not—I repeat, is not—a budget-busting bill. This bill merely provides the opportunity for these programs and policies to go forward.

In addition to the title I obligations cap, there are a number of other provisions designed to minimize any impact this legislation might have on the budget—I will very briefly mention them:

Section 201 prevents any single individual from receiving windfall benefits from the construction of a water resources project.

Section 203 automatically deauthorizes any project that hasn't received construction funding in 10 years. This will automatically, in one stroke, deauthorize 18.5 billion dollars' worth of outdated and unneeded water projects.

Section 204 automatically deauthorizes unfunded Corps of Engineers' feasibility studies.

Section 205 limits obligations for any project in this legislation to the sums listed in the bill.

Section 218 limits the degree to which the Corps of Engineers can make post-authorization changes to project features.

Section 223 assures that bidding by contractors for Corps of Engineers work is as competitive as possible.

Section 226 assures that bidding by contractors for Corps of Engineers work is as competitive as possible.

Title V requires that all spending for newly authorized locks and dam projects comes from the existing Inland Waterway Trust Fund which is fed by a tax on barge fuel bought by users of the system.

Title VI contains requirements for increased financial commitment by local sponsors for flood control, shoreline erosion control, recreation, and municipal and industrial water supply projects of the Corps of Engineers.

And title IX requires substantial local participation by non-Federal entities for the construction of general cargo and deep draft harbor projects.

Mr. President, the cost-sharing provisions of this legislation are designed to allow necessary new water development projects to proceed in fiscally responsible ways. That means, and we all know it, that non-Federal interests must begin to share a larger part of the price tag of these projects.

Now, I know that some of my colleagues will argue that we have been too kind in this bill, that we have not shifted a large enough burden to non-Federal sponsors. Others will, I know, make a case that no new cost-sharing is reasonable, that these programs should remain 100 percent federally funded.

Mr. President, the Committee on Environment and Public Works has struggled with this issue of degree for the last 4 years. And while there is no solution which is going to please all parties, I believe we have developed a cost-sharing proposal for Corps projects which is sound, and which can be supported by the vast majority of my colleagues.

The three areas of cost-sharing which have received the most attention concern flood control projects, deep-draft navigation projects, and inland navigation projects. Mr. President, I would like to make up these provisions briefly for the benefit of my colleagues.

Current policy on flood control cost-sharing, Mr. President, requires that non-Federal interests contribute necessary lands, easements, and rights of way, and that is all. While these costs are upon rare occasion very large, and on other rare occasions very small, they normally run in the range of 15 to 20 percent of total project costs. Mr. President, the committee has wrestled for years with this issue. The testimony of many experts and economists has led the committee to determine that for purposes of flood control, two principles should prevail. One was that some minimal level of the cost-sharing required would have to be contributed during construction of the project in order to provide for a "market test" of project viability, and second was that flood control projects could not be burdened with cost-sharing so as to preclude non-Federal interests from even financing their share of project costs.

Thus the committee settled on a 5 percent requirement for cash to be contributed while the project is being built, with a total requirement of 25 percent if contributed entirely while the project is being built, or 35 percent if part of the contribution is to be paid over time. Traditional lands, easements, and rights of way would count toward these precentages. In addition, and most importantly, while these guidelines are likely to be reasonable for most non-Federal interests, the committee recognized that local interests unable to finance a project should not thereby be precluded from such an element of basic infrastructure. Therefore, these cost-sharing percentages for flood control are tempered by the requirement of the Corps of Engineers to establish the ability of the non-Federal sponsor to contribute these costs, and the waiving of these costs in those cases where that ability does not exist.

Our flood control cost-sharing provisions are thus fiscally responsible, yet reflect the reality of individual case-by-case assessment of the financial where-with-all of project sponsors, which is the foundation of a solid water development partnership between Federal and non-Federal interests, as we in the West have known for years, and which is reflected in the President's letter of January 24, 1984, to Senator LAXALT outlining the administration's water policy.

Deep-draft navigation cost-sharing policy as presented in this measure, Mr. President, is also flexible, reflects the needs of our Nation's ports for improvements, and the need for a shifting of the burden of these costs to the port community.

We have established essentially three cost-sharing rules depending on the size of the port as measured by the depth of its channel. Very small ports of up to 20 feet in depth are to remain a full Federal responsibility. Frankly, Mr. President, I do not believe that very many of these very small ports, which are really small boat harbors, will be constructed by the Federal Government in the future under any cost-sharing policy.

For ports between 20 to 45 feet, Mr. President, we have created essentially a strong market test of project viability, but not an unreasonable one. We would require that such port improvement sponsor contribute 30 percent of project costs, and lands and easements would count toward this percentage, and contribute this amount during construction of the project. In order to insure that the port would have the financial backing and where-with-all to provide the necessary security for a commercial loan for such work, we would also provide a 90-percent Federal loan guarantee for the non-Federal share of these projects. In this way, these projects can go forward with little or no Federal appropriations in the initial years of construction.

For ports deeper than 45 feet, Mr. President, we have taken a different course for two reasons. First, the best economic and financial experts in the country are in essential agreeement that we need very, very few of these super deep-draft harbors for the foreseeable future. Second, we wanted to ensure that the Federal Government does not get stuck with the bill for constructing 20 or 30 of these super ports and create an inefficient port system.

Mr. President, this proposal asserts that the role of the Federal Government in the development of super deep ports should be to give limited financial backing to such efforts, but not direct budgetary support. We have therefore, set out a basic policy that such super ports should be built by local initiative, with the Federal role reserved to guaranteeing 90 percent of the loan for such work at the determination of the Secretary of the Army.

This is the basic policy of this measure for deep-draft super port development. However, because of the controversy, which this concept has aroused, we have also included a limited cost-sharing option for super port development. For 5 years after the date of authorization, these projects could be constructed with 50-50 cost sharing providing the non-Federal sponsor has provided the Secretary of the Army with adequate assurances of his ability to meet his half of project costs, and the Federal Government and non-Federal sponsors expend 10 percent of the project costs in the 5-year period.

Again, Mr. President, we have tried to be flexible and fiscally responsible. Inland navigation cost sharing, Mr. President, is the most controversial element of this legislation, and I want to say a few words about this subject. There are two undeniable facts: The first is that there are new inland projects which this country needs. The second fact is that in the current budget picture they are not going to go forward with anything like the construction pace of the corps in past years.

There has to be a balance. And I have not found any one among the barge interests able to accept the reality of the budget picture, and I have not found any evidence that the user fee proposals of the OMB have any credibility with many of my colleagues. This stalemate must end. The barge operators must recognize that we will never be returning to the days of open-ended Federal budgetary support for inland projects; OMB must appreciate that any program which has received support for over 150 years is not going to have the budget burden of this system shifted dramatically to the users of the system overnight.

I believe that the original package of reforms, which the Committee on Environment and Public Works reported on the subject, reflected a substantial movement toward a partnership with the users of the waterways which held promise of more substantive change in future years. However, that proposal was clearly rejected last year. Therefore we come to you today with a simple proposal to limit the future construction of inland projects so that they will not increase the deficit one cent.

Let me emphasize that this proposal is not a revenue-raising measure of any kind. There is no provision for new user fees to be imposed at any time in the future; moneys already collected from the existing fuel tax will be used immediately.

All this measure does is say that for new commercial inland locks and dam projects the pace at which they would be constructed would be limited by the availability of funds in the Inland Trust Fund. General taxpayer dollars would not, will not be used to finance these projects in the future. We impose no new burdens; we allow new work to proceed, but at a pace which is not a new imposition on the budget.

On this subject, Mr. President, as well as the previous cost-sharing proposals, you will hear some of my colleagues say this is too much. We cannot bear this burden. Others will say it is too little. Mr. President, we need new water development projects and this proposal, like the others, is a compromise which I believe the President should accept.

Mr. President, I would sum up by saying something about this legislation and the Nation's economy. It can be stated very simply: If we do not begin to invest in and begin to rebuild this Nation's infrastructure, including water resources work, we will go bankrupt.

Some types of Federal expenditures do create wealth and add value to this Nation's economic base. A reformed and well-defined water resources program is just such an expenditure.

This legislation reforms, redefines, and revitalizes the programs of the Corps of Engineers—this Nation's largest water agency. This a critically important agency that is floundering without our guidance.

Mr. President, compared with many others, my State receives relatively few benefits from Corps of Engineers projects and activities. I have worked hard on this legislation because it is vital; it is long overdue; and I believe in its value.

I ask other Senators to support us in recognizing this bill for what it is and what it sould be—a piece of legislation in the national interest, not a special interest or parochial Christmas tree.

Finally, Mr. President, I would like to say that Senator MOYNIHAN and I intend to act quickly to report this bill out of subcommittee soon and get it through committee by early May. Since we have held numerous hearings in the past on most of the individual provisions and projects in this bill, we intend to hold a maximum of two hearings in the Subcommittee on Water Resources to focus exclusively on its policy provisions.

Although we will send a "Dear Colleague" letter soon, I would like to say now that any Senator who wishes to testify at these hearings on the major policy provisions of this bill will be welcome to do so. If the Senate is to ever pass water resources legislation, I believe we must all be prepared to listen to each other's concerns. We hope that Members will use these hearings to help make their concerns known.●

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, during the 98th Congress I repeatedly reminded my Senate colleagues that we have not enacted a major water bill since 1970. This long period of inaction is a symptom of our inability to agree on a national water policy. In order for a water policy to be truly national, it must include two essential ingredients. First, the beneficiaries of water projects must contribute to the cost. This is the best way I know to ensure that a project is really economically sound. It is also the only fair way to meet the Nation's water resource needs in this period of budget deficits.

The second essential ingredient is equity. During the period between 1956 and 1980, the four major Federal water agencies spent 36 percent of their construction money in the West and 40 percent in the South. They spent 6 percent in the Northeast. One reason is that a major problem of the Northeast—the deterioration of aging municipal water systems—is not considered a "Federal interest." It should be.

Today I join Senator ABDNOR in introducing a bill that takes significant steps toward a national water policy. The Environment and Public Works Committee reported a water bill during the first half of the last Congress. The bill was modified repeatedly until a consensus on the major issues could be reached. After all our effort, the Senate never brought the bill up. It was a good bill last year, and it is still a good bill.

There is no question that we need to proceed with new water projects. Consider the inland waterway system. Last summer, while visiting lock and dam 26 on the Mississippi River, the Gallipolis lock and dam on the Ohio River, and Monongahela River lock and dam 8, I witnessed long barge queues and the effects of structural deterioration. But new locks and dams are expensive, and limited funds must be spent carefully. Our bill would rely on existing fees to finance new construction projects. Any project not yet under construction would be financed solely by the Inland Waterway Trust Fund, which receives revenue from an 8-cent-per-gallon fuel tax. The bill does not establish any new user fees. I believe that this approach represents a modest but useful step toward greater financial responsibility for the beneficiaries of inland waterway projects.

Similarly, we must modernize our ports to ensure the efficient transport of cargo. In the Port of New York, for example, there is an immediate need to deepen the Kill van Kull and Arthur Kill channels to 45 feet. The possibility of dredging the Ambrose and Anchorage channels to 55 feet is now under study.

Our proposal for harbor projects emphasizes flexibility. We seek to encourage port authorities to finance deep draft projects with their own resources, making available Federal loan guarantees to facilitate borrowing. There would, however, be a second option. Congress could authorize selected projects, and the Federal Government would then share costs with non-Federal sponsors. The non-Federal share would be 50 percent for the dredging of channels deeper than 45 feet, 30 percent for channels between 20 and 45 feet, and zero for shallower channels. A substantial portion of the non-Federal share would have to be paid during construction. The ports could recover their share of the costs with user fees.

I am pleased to note that the bill also includes a water supply loan program. The Corps of Engineers would be authorized to lend money to cities for the rehabilitation of water supply systems. Municipalities with severe financial constraints and those with contaminated drinking water would receive priority. The loans would be repaid at market interest rates. The program would represent one way to address a heretofore neglected national problem, one that is especially severe in older urban areas. In these areas the water distribution systems often date back to the 19th century, and large volumes of water are wasted through leakage.

The Nation badly needs this legislation. We must move on with water resource development, but we cannot do so under the old rules. Those who derive economic benefit from water development must contribute to the cost, and the problems of all regions of the country must be addressed.

Let us move toward these goals by approving this legislation.●

● Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, my colleagues, I know, share my concern that we were unable to pass needed water resources development legislation last year.

I commend the distinguished chairman of our Subcommittee on Water Resources [Mr. ABDNOR], and my distinguished friend, the Senator from New York [Mr. MOYNIHAN], who are today reintroducing a version of that legislation.

Their action will initiate the legislative process, a process that I hope we can complete in the Senate before this summer.

The leadership demonstrated by JIM ABDNOR on this issue has been outstanding.

When we eventually get a water resources law, it will be due almost entirely to Senator ABDNOR's perseverance and dedication. Senator, thank you.

I am honored to serve as a cosponsor on this bill. This is the bill we debated in the context of the continuing resolution last October. But events since then have convinced me we may need to strengthen this bill.

It may need to be strengthened to assure that it is acceptable to the administration.

I do not need to tell my colleagues of the challenge facing America today as we struggle to reduce the Federal deficit. We are working mightily to cut spending in all areas of the Federal budget.

That is not a happy process, but it is an essential one.

This omnibus water resources bill contains many important and innovative reforms. But it fails to take the additional step of reducing Federal expenditures in this decade. Even in the area where this bill is most controversial—navigation cost sharing—this bill will not produce, for many years to come, as much savings as may be necessary.

The issue is not whether the Nation needs sound water resources development. Of course, we do.

The real issue is this: Where will the money come from?

Mr. President, taxpayer spending on Army Corps of Engineers construction work will total about $890 million in this fiscal year. That represents a program, in real dollars, that has declined 78 percent from the level of construction spending two decades ago.

It is quite likely that we will see no significant increase in Federal spending on water resources projects during the coming decade.

If that assumption is correct, then any major increase in spending must come from non-Federal sources, including beneficiaries, users, and shippers. Alternatively, we must also seek more efficient uses of existing resources.

Unless we do, we will fall farther and farther behind in meeting development needs.

I have been convinced for some time that many proponents of water development have simply walked away from the struggle over the difficult issue of project cost sharing. They were convinced they could get the major new projects they wanted directly from the appropriations process.

As my colleagues will recall, that approach failed in the closing days of the 98th Congress. The will of the administration's was misjudged.

So now we must confront directly the issue of cost sharing, or it is likely there will again be no law.

The core issue in this legislation involves commercial navigation, particularly inland navigaion. The question is whether the costs for maintenance and improvements shall continue to be the responsibility of the taxpayers at large, or whether direct beneficiaries should eventually shoulder a significant portion of those costs.

Current law imposes an 8-cents-per-gallon fuel tax on operators on some of these federally operated waterways. That tax will produce about $50 million this year, well under 10 percent of the Federal spending on the commercial components of our inland waterways ($650 million).

In the 98th Congress, the administration sent up legislation, which I was pleased to introduce. That bill, S. 1554, required 70 percent cost recovery from direct beneficiaries.

I cannot tell my colleagues that 70 percent is the magic number. It may not be. But until we obtain some significant cost recovery, our national system is almost certain to continue to deteriorate.

Let me point out the view of the Congressional Budget Office, which urged the Congress to correct water project inefficiencies by adjusting Federal user fees both to produce a reliable measure of national needs and to correct present misalignment among users.

In other words, we need a program that utilizes the market place to help establish priorities in project implementation, that focuses construction spending on the most cost-effective solutions, not the most grandiose ones.

The CBO went on to say:

> To the extent that users of services are willing to repay the Government for investments made in their behalf, revenues become available to support those projects. But to the extent that higher fees prompt users to reduce demand, investment needs decline. When high fees cause reductions in demand, investments can be tailored accordingly.

Let me turn now to the issue of our ports and harbors, where taxpayer spending is high and recovery is nil. To obtain early development of a few superports, a politically neutral force—the marketplace—must become a major factor in site selection. A system of local financing, where a port authority or local government goes to the bond market and potential users to test the economic viability of the project provides such a neutral force.

This will enable us to break the cycle of inaction, to achieve harbor dredging projects in a more timely and economical fashion.

I ask my colleagues, as well as others interested in water development, to look at our challenge from that practical approach.

Unless a Federal policy can be developed that recognizes and encourages local initiative, the slow and often fruitless pace of development seems certain to continue.

I would hope that the lesson learned from the 98th Congress has been that the authorizing committees, the administration, and the water development interests must begin to work together in a constructive manner to develop—and pass—a Water Resources Act, one that authorizes needed projects and makes the policy changes necessary to strengthen the program.

The need to make inroads against the rising deficit compounds this challenge.

It is my hope that the Congress and the American people will use this bill to move toward meeting that challenge—to cut the deficit while increasing the efficiency of the program—while at the same time authorizing needed water projects.●

● Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, I am pleased to be included as a cosponsor of the Water Resources Development Act of 1985. This measure is the product of several years of hard work and consideration on the part of the members of the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

There has been some criticism of this bill because of its cost, which is approximately $13 billion. That is a lot of money, but the reason for it is simple: A water resources bill has not been signed into law since 1976, over 8 years ago. There are now over 100 proposed water resources projects which have been approved and recommended for construction by the Army Corps of Engineers but which have not been authorized by Congress.

I would emphasize that the $13 billion I mentioned will not be expended immediately upon enactment, or even in a few years. These new projects will simply become eligible to receive appropriated Federal funds, along with projects already authorized and under construction.

The fiscal year 1985 Corps of Engineers appropriation for construction funds was $890 million. Title I of this bill places a cap on corps construction, beginning with $1.4 billion in fiscal year 1986 and increasing to $1.6 billion in fiscal year 1989. That means that all the construction undertaken by the Corps of Engineers, ongoing as well as new, cannot exceed the limitation imposed for any given year.

This bill also contains cost-sharing proposals in the form of user fees for certain navigation projects, but I would add that I am not locked into the specific terms of this proposal or any other. I intend to study this aspect of the bill thoroughly in order to assess its impact on our ports and inland waterways.

I look forward to working with other members of our committee on this issue.●

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today in support of the Water Resources Development Act of 1985, and I commend my distinguished colleagues, Senator ABDNOR and Senator MOYNIHAN, for their leadership in this area. It has been several years—far too long—since Congress last enacted comprehensive water resources legislation. I believe enactment of this legislation would be a commendable first step toward that goal.

This bill contains several projects and programs of importance to New York, including long-overdue assistance for the rehabilitation, reconstruction, and maintenance of the New York Barge Canal. It also authorizes important Federal assistance for single-purpose water supply projects.

Although it authorizes other worthy New York projects, such as the inland navigation project at Olcott Harbor, shoreline protection from Rockaway Inlet to Norton Port, the Gowanus Creek channel and the Kill Van Kull Channel, and other very important projects, it does not match the level and extent of authorizations that the House of Representatives included in last year's version of this bill, H.R. 3678.

I am deeply concerned about these omissions, and, while I see the need for comprehensive water resources legislation and support this legislation, I would like to see the Senate give strong consideration to many other worthwhile projects that have not been included in the bill we are introducing today.●

● Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. President, I'm pleased to join with Senators STAFFORD, ABDNOR, MOYNIHAN, WARNER, and others in cosponsoring the Water Resources Development Act of 1985. I have long advocated the need for a permanent, equitable system of financing water projects. States and local authorities must be permitted to proceed with deep dredging and other water resources improvement projects essential to the economic well-being of the Nation.

Virginia badly needs the projects included in this bill. Other Members of the Virginia delegation and I have long pressed for their authorization. The deepening of the Port of Hampton Roads, in particular, is of great economic importance to the Commonwealth.

The failure to devise a system for financing port development has resulted in the United States falling seriously behind our trading allies in providing the type of bulk, deep-draft facilities so necessary to international trade. Improved bulk facilities mean lower transportation costs, and a more competitive posture for U.S. exports. Had we embarked on an aggressive national port development program 4 years ago, we would have a much brighter trade picture today.

An equally important reason for the deepening and improving of our Nation's ports is their vital role in our commitment to a modern Navy. The timely deployment of ships and troops and the maintenance of adequate logistical support can only be assured by modern, well-maintained harbors.

It has been 8 years since the passage of the last water projects authorization bill. The continual delay is an abrogation of Federal responsibility. We need to ensure access to waterborne commerce, maximized trade opportunities, and to meet our defense requirements. I urge my colleagues to join with me and other cosponsors of this measure in working toward a permanent system of cost sharing for all water projects as outlined in the Water Resources Development Act of 1985.●

● Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I rise to cosponsor the omnibus water resources bill being introduced today by Senators ABDNOR and MOYNIHAN, the distinguished chairman and ranking member of the Water Resources Subcommittee.

Mr. President, I do not claim to support every provision of this bill and I intend to work to improve it. However, I wish to point out to all of my colleagues that Congress has not passed a water resources authorization bill since 1976. It's time we pass one now.

This bill contains some projects that are important to the health and welfare of the people of my State. In particular, it would authorize a very needed flood control project in Rochester, MN.

This bill also includes the language of a bill I sponsored in the 98th Congress, S. 449, the Upper Mississippi River Management Act. This section would authorize a needed public works project, a second chamber at locks and dam 26 near Alton, IL. It would also authorize certain environmental mitigation programs for the upper Mississippi River.

I want to thank Senators ABDNOR and MOYNIHAN for their dedicated leadership on this issue. I pledge my support to their efforts to pass authorization legislation this year.●

● Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, it is a privilege today for me to join with my very distinguished colleague Senator ABDNOR as a cosponsor of this omnibus water resources bill which provides the framework for crucial improvements in our national port system as well as facilitating the development of other important water resources projects.

I commend Senator ABDNOR and others in the leadership of the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee for the patience and dedication which they have demonstrated on this important national issue.

The legislation which we are introducing today is not perfect, and I am certainly reserving the option to offer possible amendments on the Senate floor.

But this bill does reflect the experiences we have gained through the difficult process of negotiation and compromise during the last Congress.

This legislative framework is a firm foundation to begin the difficult but vital process of enacting an omnibus water resources bill into law.

I am encouraged by the wide degree of support the bill has already gathered and most particularly am pleased that my distinguished colleagues from Maryland have joined with Senator TRIBLE and me as cosponsors.

A modern harbor system is in the strong national interest of the United States.

It means jobs for unemployed Americans, a favorable balance of trade, fulfillment of our national security commitments, a stable source of energy for our allies, and a renewal of American competitiveness in international trade.

From throughout the heartlands of the United States goods flow to our seaports which are the lifeblood of our national economy.

The economic benefits of modern ports do not stop at the coast, but flow inland to consumers throughout the United States.

Regrettably, major public works legislation like that being proposed today has not passed the Senate since 1976.

It is long overdue.

I urge my colleagues to support this vital legislation.●

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I wish to join the distinguished subcommittee chairman in the introduction of legislation to provide the first omnibus water resources development bill since 1976.

While I recognize that the Federal deficit is the top priority of business as the 99th Congress begins, I am cosponsoring this bill because it is a responsible and necessary bill.

The Senate has a distinct choice to make with regard to water development in the United States. We can address the Nation's water resource development needs in a structured and comprehensive manner through the authorization committee as this bill proposes to do, or we can continue to pursue the country's water development needs in a haphazard way through the appropriations process with no determination of the Nation's real water development needs.

Senator ABDNOR and his committee have spent more than 4 years to put this legislative package together. I commend them on their efforts and commitment and believe that the bill Senator ABDNOR is introducing today is a solid and responsible omnibus bill which includes initiatives and reforms that will restore the credibility of the Nation's water development.

I am not advocating an increase in Federal spending to support water resources needs; however, I am advocating restraint and realistic controls over the work of the major Federal water resources agency and that the Nation's real water development needs are addressed in an orderly and comprehensive manner. This legislation meets this objective and is premised on the belief that future increases in spending on water development must come from non-Federal resources, including beneficiaries, the users, and shippers. Cost-sharing provisions for inland waterways and port development are a major element of this bill. Without cost sharing there will be no increase in development.

This bill is not a budget buster because it does not include increases in Federal expenditures. It sets limitations on the overall construction program for the Corps of Engineers for each of the next several years. It requires that each project authorized be reviewed favorably by the chief of engineers before it becomes effective. Projects will no longer be able to balloon out of control without having to be reauthorized.

For these reasons, I am joining my colleague and friend, Senator ABDNOR, in sponsoring this bill.

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I join my colleagues in sponsoring S. 366, the Omnibus Water Resources bill. S. 366 is an important step toward establishing a sound national water resources policy.

Many of the canals, locks, and dams on our Nation's inland waterway system are fast approaching the end of their useful lives. The average age of our locks is 40 years with many locks having been in service for almost 80 years. If we are to meet the transportation challenges of the next century, it is incumbent that we repair, rehabilitate and make improvements to our inland waterway system.

Similarly, major dredging and improvement efforts are essential to our Nation's port facilities. Coal is this country's most abundant resource. Last year, the United States produced 874 million tons of coal. Of this total, coal exports accounted for about 70.2 million tons. We can be even more competitive in the world coal export market. But to accomplish this goal, we must be willing to commit our resources toward upgrading and improving our port facilities.

Another critical section of S. 366 is that relating to flood control initiatives. At a tremendous cost to human life, and real and personal property many regions of our Nation have been hard hit by ravaging and destructive floodwaters. Among the most vulnerable areas affected by heavy flooding are Memphis and Shelby County in west Tennessee, and northern Mississippi. S. 366 will go a long ways toward mitigating the human and economic despair which so often accompanies natural disasters.

S. 366 authorizes several projects vital to Tennessee, but particularly to Memphis and Shelby County. Briefly, these projects are as follows: Nonconnah-Johns Creek flood control projects, $19.2 million and $16.6 million respectively; Horn Lake flood control project, $2.4 million; Memphis Harbor channel dredging, $43 million, and Big South Fork National River and Recreation development, $50 million.

Last year, Congress failed to reach a consensus on the cost sharing features of S. 1739. I expect that extensive discussions will accompany S. 366. While S. 366 is not a perfect bill, it provides a framework by which we can begin constructive debate essential to the enactment of a major water resources bill.

Again, Mr. President, I am pleased to join in sponsoring S. 366 I look forward to working with my colleagues on the Public Works Committee, as well as my other colleagues in both bodies in achieving a comprehensive water resources bill in the 99th Congress.●

By Mr. HART (for himself, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. MURKOWSKI, Mr. SIMPSON, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. SPECTER, Mr. SASSER, Mr. ANDREWS, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. COHEN, Mr. CHILES, Mr. STAFFORD, Mr. BIDEN, Mr. DOMENICI, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. SARBANES, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. MELCHER, Mr. PELL, Mr. JOHNSTON, Mr. BURDICK, and Mr. MITCHELL):

S. 367. A bill to amend title 38, United States Code, to establish certain procedures for the adjudication of claims for benefits under laws administered by the Veterans' Administration; to apply the provisions of section 553 of title 5, United States Code, to rulemaking procedures of the Veterans' Administration; to provide for judicial review of certain final decisions of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs; to provide for the payment of reasonable fees to attorneys for rendering legal representation to individuals claiming benefits under laws administered by the Veterans' Administration; and for other purposes; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION ADJUDICATION PROCEDURE AND JUDICIAL REVIEW ACT

Mr. HART. Mr. President, today I am introducing, or reintroducing, the Veterans' Administration Administrative Procedures and Judicial Review Act of 1985. The purpose of this bill is to provide veterans and other claimants before the Veterans' Administration [VA] the right to judicial review of final decisions of the administrator of veterans affairs denying claims for those beneficiaries or benefits. The bill is also designed, as its predecessor bills were in the last several Congresses to codify certain VA benefit claim procedures, to require that the VA comply with the public notice and the comment provisions of the Federal Administrative Procedures Act in its rulemaking, and to grant veterans the right to pay reasonable attorneys fees, none of which rights today exist.

Mr. President, the Veterans' Administration—the second largest client agency of the Federal Government—is one of the few agencies whose benefit decisions are not subject to the scrutiny of the Federal courts. Too often in the past, this exclusion, together with an outdated $10 limitation on attorneys fees, has resulted in an abridgement of the fundamental constitutional rights of the veteran in hearings before the VA.

Mr. President, this bill is about the fourth or fifth attempt by the Senator from Colorado to seek correction of these inequities and to bring the Veterans' Administration in line with the established administrative procedures of other agencies, or most other agencies of the Federal Government.

This bill has already 26 cosponsors, including, if I am correct, both Republicans and Democrats from the Veterans' Affairs Committee, indeed a majority of the members of that committee, both Democrats and Republicans.

Mr. President, a veteran seeking VA benefits must file a claim with the VA regional office's rating board to determine eligibility for disability, pension, or other benefits. If the local rating board renders an unfavorable decision, the veteran can appeal to the Board of Veterans Appeals [BVA] in Washington, DC, which is also part of the VA. Under existing law, the decision of the BVA on, "any question of law or fact under any laws administered by the Veterans' Administration providing benefits for veterans and their dependents or survivors, shall be final and conclusive, and no other official or any court of the United States shall have power or jurisdiction to review any such decision" (38 U.S.C. 211 (a)). Unlike claimants before other Federal agencies, a veteran who feels that the BVA has misinterpreted the law, or decided a case without taking all relevant facts into account, has no recourse outside the Veterans' Administration.

By contrast, the Social Security Administration—which also adjudicates disability claims—has been subject to judicial review of its final benefit decisions (42 U.S.C. 405(g)) for more than two decades.

Mr. President, to insulate any agency from the scrutiny of the courts runs counter to some of our most cherished constitutional principles. In human terms, this denial of the due process rights of veterans has too often resulted in hardship and disillusionment for those who have defended our country and are most deserving of the guarantees of our constitutional form of government.

Mr. President, I first introduced legislation to open the Veterans' Administration to outside court review in May 1976. Since that time, my colleagues in the Senate have joined me in successfully passing on three occasions legislation similar to that which I am introducing today in the 96th, 97th, and 98th Congresses. Both Senators CRANSTON and SIMPSON have supported this legislation through their distinguished leadership as chairmen of the Senate Veterans' Affairs Committee. I was grateful for their help and guidance when this legislation was brought to the floor for its successful consideration in the last Congress as S. 636.

Mr. President, the central issue in the debate on this bill is whether we are going to afford the American veteran the same constitutional rights we grant other citizens in this country. Judicial review is important in granting the veteran adequate protection of his or her rights as a citizen, and it will provide improved oversight of VA procedures and activities by an independent outside body. American veterans have been denied for too long their fundamental right to simple justice in the adjudication of Veterans' Administration claims. Under current VA procedures, veterans have no right to appeal outside the agency, are effectively denied access to an attorney, and cannot question in Federal court the validity of VA rules and regulations promulgated by the agency. My legislation will correct these deficiencies and finally restore the full consitutional rights of the American veteran.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, I also am pleased that the senior Senator from the State of California, Senator CRANSTON, who, of course, has been so deeply identified with the concerns of veterans of all wars over the past several years is the principal cosponsor of this bill and joins me in its introduction and in the effort that we jointly propose to seek early enactment of this legislation and hopefully the signature of the President.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the text of the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 367

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) this Act may be cited as the "Veterans' Administration Adjudication Procedure and Judicial Review Act".

The Administrator shall assist a claimant in developing the facts pertinent to his or her claim.

"(b) When, after consideration of all evidence and material of record in any proceeding before the Veterans' Administration involving a claim for benefits under laws administered by the Veterans' Administration, there is an approximate balance of positive and negative evidence regarding the merits of an issue material to the determination of such claim, the benefit of the doubt in resolving each such issue will be given to the claimant, but nothing in this section shall be construed as shifting from a claimant to the Administrator the burden described in subsection (a) of this section.".

If the Board denies the request of such claimant for such an opinion, the Board shall prepare and provide to the claimant and the claimant's authorized representative, if any, a statement setting forth the basis for its determination. Actions of the Board under this subsection, including any such denial, shall be final and conclusive, and no other official or any court of the United States shall have the power or jurisdiction to review any aspect of any such decision by an action in the nature of mandamus or otherwise, the provisions of subchapter II of chapter 71 of this title to the contrary notwithstanding.".

On the filing by a party in good faith of a timely and sufficient affidavit averring personal bias or other cause for disqualification on the part of such an employee, the Administrator shall determine the matter as a part of the record and decision in the case.

(a) In order to evaluate the feasibility and desirability of alternative methods of (1) assuring the resolution of claims before the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs for benefits under laws administered by the Veterans' Administration as promptly and efficiently as feasible following the filing of a notice of disagreement pursuant to section 4005 (as amended by section 106 of this Act) or 4005A of title 38, United States Code, and (2) affording claimants the opportunity for a hearing before or review by a disinterested authority at a location as convenient and on as timely basis as possible for each claimant, the Administrator is authorized to conduct a study, commencing not more than one year after the date of the enactment of this Act, for a period of twenty-four months, involving either or both of the alternative methods described in subsection (b) of this section for resolution of claims.

(b)(1) In not more than three geographic areas, the Administrator is authorized to provide an intermediate-level adjudication process whereby each claimant may, within the time afforded such claimant under paragraph (3) of section 4005(d) or 4005A(b) of title 38, United States Code, to file an appeal, request a de novo hearing at the agency of original jurisdiction (as described in section 4005(b)(1) of such title) before a panel of three Veterans' Administration employees, each of whose primary responsibilities include adjudicative functions but none of whom shall have previously considered the merits of the claim at issue. Following such hearing, such panel shall render a decision and prepare a new statement of the case in accordance with the requirements of paragraphs (1) and (2) of section 4005(d) of such title. Such new statement of the case shall, for all purposes relating to appeals under chapter 71 of such title, be considered to be a statement of the case as required by paragraph (1) of such section 4005(d).

(2) In not more than three other geographic areas, the Administrator is authorized to provide for an enhanced schedule of visits, on at least a quarterly basis each year, by a panel or panels of the Board of Veterans' Appeals to conduct formal recorded hearings pursuant to section 4002 of such title in such areas.

(c) Not later than six months after the completion of such study, the Administrator shall report to the Congress on the results thereof, including an evaluation of the cost factors associated with each alternative studied and with any appropriate further implementation thereof, the impact on the workload of each regional office involved in such study, and the impact on the annual caseload of the Board of Veterans' Appeals resulting from each alternative studied, together with any recommendations for administrative or legislative action, or both, as may be indicated by such results.

"SUBCHAPTER I—GENERAL"; and

(2) by adding at the end thereof the following new subchapter:

"SUBCHAPTER II—JUDICIAL REVIEW

"§ 4025. Right of review; commencement of action

"(a) For the purposes of this chapter—

"(1) 'final decision of the Administrator' means—

"(A) a final determination of the Board of Veterans' Appeals pursuant to section 4004 (a) or (b) of this title; or

"(B) a dismissal of an appeal by the Board of Veterans' Appeals pursuant to section 4005 or 4008 of this title; and

"(2) 'claim for benefits' means—

"(A) an initial claim filed under section 3001 of this title;

"(B) a challenge to a decision of the Administrator reducing, suspending, or terminating benefits; or

"(C) any request by or on behalf of the claimant for reopening, reconsideration, or further consideration in a matter described in clause (A) or (B) of this paragraph.

"(b) Except as provided in subsection (f) of this section, after any final decision of the Administrator adverse to a claimant in a matter involving a claim for benefits under any law administered by the Veterans' Administration, such claimant may obtain a review of such decision in a civil action commenced within one hundred eighty days after notice of such decision is mailed to such claimant pursuant to section 4004(d) of this title. Such action shall be brought against the Administrator in the district court of the United States for the judicial district in which the plaintiff resides or the plaintiff's principal place of business is located, or in the district court of the United States for the judicial district where the principal offices of the Board of Veterans' Appeals (established under section 4001 of this title) are located.

"(c) The complaint initiating an action under subsection (a) of this section shall contain sufficient information to permit the Administrator to identify and locate the plaintiff's records in the custody or control of the Veterans' Administration.

"(d) Not later than thirty days after filing the answer to a complaint filed pursuant to subsection (a) of this section, the Administrator shall file a certified copy of the records upon which the decision complained of is based or, if the Administrator determines that the cost of filing copies of all such records is unduly expensive, the Administrator shall file a complete index of all documents, transcripts, or other materials comprising such records. After such index is filed and after considering requests from all parties, the court shall require the Administrator to file certified copies of such indexed items as the court considers relevant to its consideration of the case.

"(e) In an action brought pursuant to subsection (b) of this section, the court shall have the power, upon the pleadings and the records specified in subsection (d) of this section, to enter judgment in accordance with section 4026 of this title or remand the cause in accordance with such section or section 4027 of this title.

"(f)(1) No action may be brought under this section unless (A) the initial claim for benefits is filed pursuant to section 3001 of this title on or before the last day of the fifth fiscal year beginning after the effective date of this section, and (B) the complaint initiating such action is filed not more than one hundred and eighty days after notice of the first final decision of the Administrator rendered after the last day of such fiscal year is mailed to the claimant pursuant to section 4004(d) of this title. If the case is reopened pursuant to section 4004(b)(2)(A) of this title within one hundred and eighty days after such notice is mailed, the next final decision shall, for purposes of this subsection, be considered the first final decision of the Administrator.

"(2) No action may be brought under this section with respect to matters arising under chapters 19 and 37 of this title.

"§ 4026. Scope of review

"(a)(1) In any action brought under section 4025 of this title, the court, to the extent necessary to its decision and when presented, shall—

"(A) decide all relevant questions of law, interpret constitutional and statutory provisions, and determine the meaning or applicability of the terms of an action of the Administrator;

"(B) compel action of the Administrator unlawfully withheld;

"(C) hold unlawful and set aside decisions, findings (other than those described in clause (D) of this paragraph), and conclusions of the Administrator found to be—

"(i) arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion, or otherwise not in accordance with law;

"(ii) contrary to constitutional right, power, privilege, or immunity;

"(iii) in excess of statutory jurisdiction, authority, or limitations, or in violation of a statutory right; or

"(iv) without observance of procedure required by law; and

"(D) in the case of a finding of material fact made in reaching a decision on a claim for benefits under laws administered by the Veterans' Administration, hold unlawful and set aside such finding when it is so utterly lacking in a rational basis in the evidence that a manifest and grievous injustice would result if such finding were not set aside.

"(2) Before setting aside any finding of fact under paragraph (1)(D) of this subsection, the court shall specify the deficiencies in the record upon which the court would set aside such finding and shall remand the case one time to the Administrator for further action not inconsistent with the order of the court in remanding the case. In remanding a case under the first sentence of this paragraph, the court shall specify a reasonable period of time within which the Administrator shall complete the ordered action. If the Administrator does not complete action on the case within the specified period of time, the case shall be returned to the court for its further action.

"(b) In making the determinations under subsection (a) of this section, the whole record before the court pursuant to section 4025(d) of this title shall be subject to review, and the court shall review those parts of such record cited by a party, and due account shall be taken of the rule of prejudicial error.

"(c) In no event shall findings of fact made by the Administrator be subject to trial de novo by the court.

"(d) When a final decision of the Administrator is adverse to a party and the sole stated basis for such decision is the failure of such party to comply with any applicable regulation of the Veterans' Administration, the court shall review only questions raised as to compliance with and the validity of the regulation.

"§ 4027. Remands

"(a)(1) In any action brought under section 4025 of this title, the court shall, on motion of the Administrator made before the expiration of the time specified for the filing of an answer to a complaint filed pursuant to subsection (b) of such section, allow a single remand of a case to the Administrator for further review by the Administrator. If such review is not completed within ninety days after the date of such remand, the matter shall be returned to the court for its action.

"(2)(A) At any time after the Administrator files an answer, the court may, in the exercise of its discretion, remand the case to the Administrator for further action by the Administrator.

"(B) If either party shall apply to the court for leave to adduce additional evidence and shall show to the satisfaction of the court that such additional evidence is material and that there is good cause for granting such leave, the court shall remand the case to the Administrator and order such additional evidence to be taken by the Administrator.

"(C) In the case of a remand under subparagraph (A) or (B) of this paragraph, the court may specify a reasonable period of time within which the Administrator shall complete the required action.

"(b) After a case is remanded to the Administrator under subsection (a) of this section, and after further action by the Administrator, including consideration of any additional evidence, the Administrator shall modify, supplement, affirm, or reverse the findings of fact or decision, or both, and shall file with the court any such modification, supplementation, affirmation, or reversal of the findings of fact or decision or both, as the case may be, and certified copies of any additional records and evidence upon which such modification, supplementation, affirmation, or reversal was based. Any such modification, supplementation, affirmation, or reversal of the findings of fact or decision shall be reviewable by the court only to the extent provided in section 4026 of this title.

"§ 4028. Survival of actions

"Any action brought under section 4025 of this title shall survive notwithstanding any change in the person occupying the office of Administrator or any vacancy in such office.

"§ 4029. Appellate review

"The decisions of a district court pursuant to this chapter shall be subject to appellate review by the courts of appeals and the Supreme Court of the United States in the same manner as judgments in other civil actions.".

(1) by inserting before the item relating to section 4001 the following new item:

"SUBCHAPTER I—GENERAL";

and

(2) by adding after the item (added by section 108(b) of this Act) relating to section 4011 the following new items:

TITLE IV—ATTORNEYS' FEES

SEC. 401. Section 3404 is amended by striking out subsection (c) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(c) The Administrator shall approve reasonable attorneys' fees to be paid by the claimant to attorneys for representation before the Veterans' Administration in connection with a claim for benefits under laws administered by the Veterans' Administration, but in no event shall such attorneys' fees exceed—

"(1) for any claim resolved prior to or at the time that a final decision of the Administrator is first rendered, $10; or

"(2) for any claim resolved after such time—

"(A) if the claimant and an attorney have entered into an agreement under which no fee is payable to such attorney unless the claim is resolved in a manner favorable to the claimant, 25 percent of the total amount of any past-due benefits awarded on the basis of the claim; or

"(B) if the claimant and an attorney have not entered into such an agreement, the lesser of—

"(i) the fee agreed upon by the claimant and the attorney; or

"(ii) $500, or such greater amount as may be specified from time to time in regulations which the Administrator shall prescribe based on changed national economic conditions subsequent to the date of enactment of this subsection, except that the Administrator may, in the Administrator's discretion, determine and approve a fee in excess of $500, or such greater amount if so specified, in an individual case involving extraordinary circumstances warranting a higher fee.

"(d)(1) If, in an action brought under section 4025 of this title, the matter is resolved in a manner favorable to a claimant who was represented by an attorney, the court shall determine and allow a reasonable fee for such representation to be paid to the attorney by the claimant. When the claimant and an attorney have entered into an agreement under which the amount of the fee payable to such attorney is to be paid from any past-due benefits awarded on the basis of the claim and the amount of the fee is contingent on whether or not the matter is resolved in a manner favorable to the claimant, the fee so determined and allowed shall not exceed 25 percent of the total amount of any past-due benefits awarded on the basis of the claim.

"(2) If, in an action brought under section 4025 of this title, the matter is not resolved in a manner favorable to the claimant, the court, taking into consideration the likelihood at the time such action was filed that the claimant would prevail, may determine and allow a reasonable fee not in excess of $750 to be paid to the attorney by the claimant for the representation of such claimant.

"(e) To the extent that past-due benefits are awarded in proceedings before the Administrator or a court, the Administrator shall direct that payment of any attorneys' fee that has been determined and allowed under this section be made out of such past-due benefits, but in no event shall the Administrator withhold for the purpose of such payment any portion of benefits payable for a period subsequent to the date of the final decision of the Administrator or court making such award.

"(f) The provisions of this section shall apply only to cases involving claims for benefits under the laws administered by the Veterans' Administration, and such provisions shall not apply in cases in which the Veterans' Administration is the plaintiff or in which other attorneys' fee statutes are applicable.

"(g) For the purposes of this section—

"(1) the terms 'final decision of the Administrator' and 'claim for benefits' shall have the same meaning provided for such terms, respectively, in section 4025 (a) of this title; and

"(2) claims shall be considered as resolved in a manner favorable to the claimant when all or any part of the relief sought is granted.

"(h) In an action brought under section 4025 of this title, the court may award to a prevailing party, other than the Administrator, reasonable attorneys' fees and costs in accordance with the provisions of subsection (d) of section 2412 of title 28, as in effect on the day before the effective date of the repeal of such subsection (as provided in section 204(c) of the Equal Access to Justice Act (Public Law 96-481; 94 Stat. 2329; 28 U.S.C. 2412 note)).".

SEC. 402. Section 3405 is amended—

(1) by striking out "or" after "title,"; and

(2) by striking out "him" and inserting in lieu thereof "such claimant or beneficiary, or (3) with intent to defraud, in any manner willfully and knowingly deceives, misleads, or threatens a claimant or beneficiary or prospective claimant or beneficiary under this title with reference to any matter covered by this title".

TITLE V—EFFECTIVE DATES

SEC. 501. This Act and the amendments made by this Act shall take effect on the first day of the first month beginning not less than one hundred and eighty days after the date of enactment of this Act.

SEC. 502. A civil action authorized in subchapter II of chapter 71 of title 38, United States Code (as added by section 302(a) of this Act) may be instituted to review decisions of the Board of the Veterans' Appeals rendered on or after April 1, 1985.

S. 367: VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION ADJUDICATION PROCEDURE AND JUDICIAL REVIEW ACT

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with my good friend, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. HART], in introducing S. 367, the proposed Veterans' Administration Adjudication Procedure and Judicial Review Act. I am delighted to note that we are joined by 24 original cosponsors, including the chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, Mr. MURKOWSKI, the immediate past chairman of the committee, my good friend from Wyoming, Mr. SIMPSON, and my good friends and other colleagues on the Veterans' Affairs Committee, Senators MATSUNAGA, DECONCINI, MITCHELL, STAFFORD, and SPECTER. Five of the cosponsors are members of the Judiciary Committee, including the ranking minority member of that committee, Mr. BIDEN, and three members, Mr. SIMPSON, Mr. DECONCINI, and Mr. SPECTER, who serve on both the Veterans' Affairs and Judiciary Committees. The broad bipartisan support demonstrated by this array of cosponsors is a strong indication of the merits of this legislation.

PURPOSE OF THE BILL

The basic purpose of this measure is to ensure that veterans and other claimants before the VA receive all benefits to which they are entitled under law by providing them with the opportunity for judicial review of final decisions of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs denying claims for benefits, by codifying certain internal procedures of the VA relating to the adjudication of benefit claims, by requiring that VA rulemaking processes comply with provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act relating to notice and comment, and by allowing claimants to pay attorneys reasonable fees for representation before the VA after a decision by the Board of Veterans' Appeals and for representation in judicial proceedings. My June 15, 1983, floor statement upon Senate passage of S. 636 discusses the bill's provisions in detail—S8488 of the daily edition of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

BACKGROUND

Mr. President, the measure we are introducing today is substantially identical to S. 636, as reported by the Veterans' Affairs Committee on May 18, 1983, and passed by the Senate as H.R. 2936 on June 15, 1983, in all respects except one, the absence of provisions that had been included in title I of S. 636 dealing with the size and membership of the Board of Veterans' Appeals, an issue that was resolved in Public Law 98-223.

Mr. President, legislation to provide for judicial review of decisions of the Veterans' Administration on claims for benefits has been through an extended period of development in the Senate—beginning in the 94th Congress when the Senator from Colorado [Mr. HART] first introduced such legislation. During this period, the Committee on Veterans' Affairs has held nine hearings on judicial review legislation, and the Judiciary Committee has held one such hearing. Judicial review legislation has been before both the Veterans' Affairs Committee and the Judiciary Committee, with the Veterans' Affairs Committee three times voting to report such legislation, and the Judiciary Committee twice, after referral of the reported bill for a period of time, taking no action to amend the reported measures before being discharged from further consideration. The measures reported by the Veterans' Affairs Committees—S. 330 in the 96th Congress, S. 349 in the 97th Congress, and S. 636 in the last Congress—were passed by the Senate without dissent.

Unfortunately, the House Veterans' Affairs Committee, to which the measures were referred in the other body, has taken no action on any of the measures. Nevertheless, I continue to hope that, should the Senate again pass judicial review legislation, the Committee on Veterans' Affairs in the other body will work with us to develop a consensual approach on this important issue.

NEED FOR THE BILL

Mr. President, there are a number of strong reasons supporting the enactment of judicial review legislation, and I would like to highlight some of them briefly at this time.

FAIRNESS FOR INDIVIDUAL CLAIMANTS

One of the principal reasons judicial review is needed is to help ensure fairness to individual claimants before the VA. In saying this, I do not mean to indicate a belief that the Board of Veterans' Appeals—the final adjudicative body within the VA—in any way intends to deny to veterans such fairness or that, despite the Board's best efforts, there is a routine denial of fairness. To the contrary, I believe that the members of the Board are fairminded, conscientious individuals who make a concerted effort to carry out their responsibilities in an evenhanded fashion and that, by and large, most claimants before the VA are treated fairly. However, I do know that the present system, which results in final, unappealable decisions by the Board, together with the statutory limit of $10 on the amount a claimant before the VA can pay an attorney for representation, leaves many disappointed claimants believing that they have been denied a full and fair opportunity to pursue their claims and that, as veterans, they are denied important rights that citizens have in dealing with virtually all other Federal agencies.

In addition to this perception of a denial of justice, Mr. President, is the very real chance that actual injustices do occur under the current system, a problem that opportunity for judicial review would substantially ameliorate. Although I know that the VA claims adjudication system is set up to be supportive of the veteran—as it should be—the VA is a very large and complex Federal agency, and unfair results do occur. I have long been concerned that the tremendous volume of claims handled by the Board of Veterans' Appeals provides a significant opportunity for some injustices to occur. On the basis of current trends, the number of claims handled by the Board will continue to increase, thereby increasing the possibility of unintended unfair results.

REVIEW OF QUESTIONABLE AGENCY POLICIES

Mr. President, another principal reason for judicial review legislation is the need to establish a basis for the review of questionable agency actions restricting, withholding, or withdrawing VA benefits—actions that can be expected to increase in frequency as there is greater pressure within the executive branch for the VA to act unilaterally to achieve cost savings in current programs. There have been numerous examples of such actions in recent years—such as efforts by the VA to collect for the cost of health care provided to veterans who happen to be VA employees; attempts by the agency, at the direction of the Office of Management and Budget, to restrict beneficiary travel reimbursement for eligible veterans; allegations that some VA stations are applying very stringent standards in cases in which Vietnam veterans are seeking to be granted service connection for post traumatic stress disorder; and the VA's drawing overly restrictive regulations to implement the targeted GI bill delimiting-date extension enacted in Public Law 97-72 as well as the radiation-exposure health-care eligibility enacted in that same public law.

In each of these cases and in other similar cases, the lack of access to court review has serious implications. Although the Committees on Veterans' Affairs in both Houses do their utmost to oversee the activities of the VA, the limited resources of the committee do not allow for thorough review of and congressional action to resolve satisfactorily all of the issues arising in such a large and complex agency. In addition, I do not believe that aggrieved veterans should have to be dependent for relief on congressional committee processes which, for all their virtues, cannot be fairly said to be designed to achieve or to be capable of achieving systematically the even-handed dispensation of justice. Also, although the results of committee oversight are often salutary in terms of bringing about—either through legislation or administrative action under pressure, as was the case in the latter two examples I just cited—reversals of agency action, there is usually a long delay in having the correction made. In contrast, injunctive relief for irreparable injury can be a very speedy remedy.

By way of a current example of this type of situation, apparently there is, at present, a plan being developed within the administration which would establish a "means test" to determine eligibility for VA health care—ostensibly pursuant to authority provided by the Congress in 1980—in such a way as to deny care to veterans with incomes above specified levels regardless of whether they are, in fact, able to defray the costs of their care. If the plan is implemented in this way, many veterans who Congress intended to be eligible for care on the basis of actual inability to defray the costs of their care will be denied such care, and this would be just the latest example of a questionable agency action affecting veterans which an individual veteran should have the right to have adjudicated by a tribunal outside of the VA.

If the veterans affected by various VA actions had access to court to challenge those actions, the individuals most directly affected by these actions would be guaranteed the opportunity to be heard by an entity outside of the VA and to obtain urgent and timely relief in certain cases. In a similar way, the VA's handling of claims based on exposure to agent orange or to radiation from the detonation of a nuclear weapon would benefit from outside review by allowing those who believe they have been harmed to have their claims tested in an independent forum.

Mr. President, in making this point, I do not want to be understood as suggesting that the VA is wrong on all or any of these issues. Rather, I am suggesting that outside review by the independent branch of Government established in our constitutional framework with the special responsibility of determining whether governmental action is legal and whether it is fundamentally fair would benefit all parties involved. The VA would have its processes subjected to appropriate scrutiny and, to the extent the agency's actions were upheld, would be vindicated. Likewise, to the extent the agency's actions were held unlawful or fundamentally unfair, steps could be taken to improve the process so as to ensure that the agency is fulfilling its mission to serve veterans in the best possible fashion. I am concerned that agency action that does not have the benefit of outside scrutiny may fail to address fully the legitimate needs of those the agency exists to serve, and I believe that providing for judicial review would basically correct this shortcoming.

REVIEW BY AN INDEPENDENT TRIBUNAL

Mr. President, another important reason in support of judicial review is related to the status of the Board of Veterans' Appeals. Fundamental principles of due process, as guaranteed by the Constitution, require an independent review of administrative action affecting individuals' liberty or property interests. Although there are earlier court decisions suggesting that veterans' benefits are gratuities and not worthy of general due process protections, such a viewpoint is no longer valid, either philosophically—veterans' benefits are earned by service in the military—or legally in light of a number of decisions rendered by the Supreme Court in the last decade holding that various statutory governmental benefits are legal entitlements and, thus, protected property interests of the beneficiary.

Mr. President, I do not believe that review by the Board provides the required independent action required by due process. Although the Board is not directly under the control of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, it is far too bound up with the agency, in many informal ways, to be truly independent and, more importantly, its independence is restricted by law. Under section 4004(c) of title 38, the Board is "bound in its decisions by the regulations of the Veterans' Administration, instructions of the Administrator, and the precedent opinions of the chief law officer." Although I have high regard for the integrity of both the incumbent Administrator and the acting general counsel, this does not alter the fact that the potential for them—and future incumbents in those offices—to restrict the decisionmaking authority of the Board significantly restricts that body's independence.

CLARIFY THE STATE OF THE LAW

A final purpose of judicial review legislation is to help clarify the state of the law on the scope of the current law provision that bars judicial review, section 211(a) of title 38. At present, there are some important differences between the various U.S. courts of appeals regarding the sweep of this prohibition, and I am concerned that the VA contributes to this confusion by raising the 211(a) bar in cases in which it is not appropriate. Thus, the circuit where a veteran seeks to bring an action may well determine the outcome of the case—a result that should be avoided.

Some courts have held, correctly I believe, that the 211(a) bar applies only to claims for benefits by individual veterans, while other courts have let the bar preclude suits involving other than individual benefit decisions.

Despite the agency's acknowledgement, in testimony before our committee in 1983, that some courts of appeals clearly have allowed veterans to bring actions challenging VA regulations on other than constitutional grounds, the U.S. Government, on behalf of the VA, continues to raise the section 211(a) statutory bar to judicial review in VA cases that do not involve individual claims for benefits.

SCOPE OF REVIEW

The last matter that I want to touch on involves the appropriate scope of review that a court would apply in the review of a VA fact decision. This issue has been a matter of long and involved discussion in our committee over the years, and I will not attempt to go over all that background. Rather, the one point I want to stress on this issue today is my belief that it is vital that whatever scope of review is chosen must provide some basis for court review of questions of fact. The bills passed by the Senate in 1981 and 1983 each included a very narrow scope of review of factual issues. The bill we are introducing today contains that same provision. Providing only a very narrow basis on which a court could review a decision by the Board of Veterans' Appeals on a question of fact reaffirms the Board's role as the expert final arbiter of such questions. However, by refusing to limit the review to questions of law only and thus preclude all review of questions of fact—an approach that some have advocated—this legislation affords an opportunity to correct truly egregious decisions on fact questions. Although I believe that such decisions are rare, I do not believe that total preclusion of review of facts would be appropriate or productive. Indeed, I believe that the very existence of even a narrow window of review would have the effect of preventing almost all such outrageous decisions from ever being made in the first instance.

FUNDAMENTAL FAIRNESS FOR VETERANS

Mr. President, I want to answer a question I am sometimes asked in view of our lack of success to date in getting judicial review legislation considered in the other body. The question is usually posed along the following lines: "What is so wrong about the present system for adjudicating VA claims that you persist in pursuing this legislation?" Although I am fully able to respond to the issue when it is posed in this way—as I did briefly earlier in my statement—I do not believe finding fault with the current system is a necessary step in making the case for judicial review. Rather, I believe the appropriate first question is whether there is any continuing reason—putting to one side the question of whether there ever was a valid reason—for denying veterans the same right of access to court review of VA benefits decisions that is available in the case of virtually every other Federal benefit. Although there are some restrictions in current law on access to judicial review of some Federal agency actions, only one area, Federal employee workers' compensation benefits, is at all analogous to VA benefits.

When the issue is posed this way—why should veterans be denied rights available to others in their dealings with the Federal Government? I have never heard a satisfactory answer justifying maintaining the current-law preclusion. I realize that concerns have been expressed that judicial review would have an undue impact on the agency's current claims adjudication processes. I have also heard concerns that providing for judicial review would make the VA claims process more adversarial, would create unnecessary delay, and would cost veterans money in the form of attorneys' fees. Although I fully recognize the genuineness of these concerns, I do not believe they are well founded. Briefly, here is why.

RESPONSES TO ARGUMENTS ABOUT JUDICIAL REVIEW

As to the possibility that providing for judicial review could have an untoward effect on the current VA system, the legislation that has been developed in the Senate over the years contains numerous provisions that have been designed expressly to avoid that result. These provisions would ensure that, to the extent feasible, the VA's current, desirable adjudiciation practices and procedures would be protected by providing a statutory basis for them. In this way, not only would current processes be protected in the event of judicial review, but they would actually be strengthened by being set out in law rather than being based on regulations or, in some cases, on no more than informal past practice.

With reference to the concerns about judicial review causing undue delay or about it somehow making the veteran and the agency adversaries, it is important to remember that under this legislation, judicial review would be available only after a veteran's claim has been turned down by the regional office, and, on appeal, by the Board of Veterans' Appeals. At that point, it is difficult to see how providing for judicial review could create any delay. The VA proceedings would have run their normal course. A process no longer going anywhere can't be delayed. Moreover, once the claim is finally denied, a dispute clearly exists. A veteran whose claim has been finally denied by the VA's highest appeal tribunal would not become an adversary of the VA by virtue of having court review available. Courts don't create adversarial situations; they resolve them.

Regarding attorneys' fees, to me it's almost incomprehensible that the current law limit of $10 on the amount that an attorney can be paid has survived to this time. Whatever behavior characterized the legal profession at the time the original limitation was enacted following the Civil War, it is no longer credible to insist that attorneys would prey on innocent veterans. I also am unable to accept the view that veterans, as a class, are so unable to protect themselves that there needs to be a barrier erected in law between them and attorneys. Let me be clear—I do not believe that most veterans with claims before the VA should be advised to seek the assistance of an attorney. Certainly, my first advice to a veteran with such a claim is to contact a veterans' service officer. But the existence of that superb resource is not a reason for totally precluding a veteran from seeking to obtain the services of an attorney if the veteran wishes to do so.

On this point, I stress again that this legislation would not lift the $10 limit in a particular case until after the veteran has received an initial BVA decision. Thus, this legislation contemplates that the current practice of veterans being assisted by skilled veterans' service officers throughout the VA and BVA administrative process would continue to operate exactly as it does now.

I want to address one final argument that is sometimes raised as a reason for continuing the bar to judicial review—the impact of a new class of claimants on the Federal judiciary. Without detailing the various contentions on this point—and there have been widely differing views on this issue expressed before our committee over the years—I do not understand why veterans and others with claims before the VA should continue to be discriminated against and denied important rights because treating them fairly might enlarge the responsibilities of the court system. If the Federal court system is overburdened, the Congress should address that problem on an equitable basis by expanding available resources or limiting access to court on some basis that applies to all citizens. It is blatantly unfair and arbitrary to deal with perceived problems in the courts by singling out veternas for exclusion with respect to benefits earned by service in the military.

In any event, in my view, after a shakedown period in which the narrow scope of fact-review had resulted in summary judgments against plaintiffs with poor cases and after the BVA had become accustomed to being subject to outside review and had adjusted its decisionmaking and decisionwriting activities accordingly, I do not believe the amount of litigation would be a substantial burden on the Federal judiciary.

In summary, it is for one reason—to provide access to justice for veterans as a matter of fundamental fairness—that I continue to support this legislation.

COST ESTIMATE

Mr. President, when S. 636 was before the Senate in the last Congress, the Congressional Budget Office estimated that its first-year costs—not including costs attributable to changes in the size of the Board of Veterans' Appeals made by Public Law 98-223—would be $1.7 million and the cost for the first 5 years would be $26.5 million. Although that estimate has not yet been updated, I see no reason for any change except for the effects of inflation. Thus, the final cost of this measure would be, I believe, a very modest cost to pay to ensure that veterans, their survivors, and other claimants before the VA are given a full and fair opportunity to have their claims for statutory benefits reviewed and evaluated.

CONCLUSION

Mr. President, I look forward to working with our new Veterans' Affairs Committee chairman, Mr. MURKOWSKI, and with Senator HART, Senator SIMPSON, the other cosponsors of this measure, and all of my colleagues on this important legislation in the months ahead.

By Mr. DURENBERGER:

S. 368. A bill to amend title 31, United States Code, to include in the President's budget of the U.S. Government a statement of the interest which accrues for each fiscal year on outstanding zero-coupon bonds; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

ZERO-COUPON BONDS

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, about 6 months ago, I read a disturbing article in the New York Times that recommended the U.S. Treasury Department issue zero-coupon bonds [ZCB's] and thus defer interest payments on the national debt. By the use of ZCB's, the Federal Government would borrow money and pay no annual interest on the bonds until the bond matures at which time the accumulated interest and principle would be due and payable.

It is sad indeed that we are mortaging our future by borrowing large sums of money to finance the deficit and leaving the repayment of the principal to the next generation—our children. With the use of ZCB's as recommended by the New York Times, not only would the principal amount of the loans be repaid by our children, but all the interest on the principal of the loans would also be shifted to our children. The size of the Federal deficit is without a doubt, one of the most important issues facing the Congress and this Nation. However, we should not and we cannot impose unreasonable burdens on the next generation for our irresponsible deficit spending

In order to better understand ZCB's, I ask unanimous consent my letter that was published September 3, 1984, in the New York Times be printed following these remarks, and I urge my distinguished colleagues to take a minute to read it.

I am concerned about the extent to which the issuance of a ZCB would tend to establish a floor on interest rates, particularly where the underlying obligation has a long maturity. In addition, I am concerned about the uncertainty under existing governments accounting procedures as to whether the interest accrued on zero-coupon obligations would be properly reflected in the annual interest expense of the Federal Government.

Last fall, in a meeting with my staff, Treasury officials assured us that the Department had, at that time, no plans to issue ZCB's. But in case the Treasury does decide to issue ZCB's, I am firmly convinced that the accrued interest on these bonds should be properly reflected as a separate item in the President's budget when it is submitted to the Congress.

Earlier this month, the Treasury Department announced plans to make it easier for banks and securities dealers to sell separately the interest payments and principal of certain 10-year notes and 30-year bonds. This program is known as separate trading of registered interest and principal of securities or "strips." This is not a ZCB since Treasury pays the interest on a semiannual basis. Treasury officials have again advised my staff that Treasury has no plans to issue ZCB's.

To make certain that the President's budget reflects the accrued interest on a ZCB that might be issued by the Treasury, I am today introducing a bill which amends section 1105 of title 31 of the United States Code—relating to various items that must be included in the President's budget—to require a separate statement in each budget setting forth the interest that would accrue on any ZCB's. This bill is identical with S. 3038 which I introduced on September 29, 1984.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMMITTEE ON FINANCE,
Washington, DC, August 28, 1984.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR,
The New York Times,
New York, NY.

TO THE EDITOR: I am alarmed that the New York Times would so casually recommend abusing zero-coupon bonds (ZCBs) to defer interest payments on the national debt ("Cut the Debt Caused by Debt," August 15). There ought to be a law against seizing the wealth of the next generation and, frankly, I can't think of a better place to start than with ZCBs.

Sadly, zero-coupon bonds are only the latest and most effective of a long line of popular schemes my generation has devised to pass the costs of our lifestyles onto our children. Under decades of bipartisan leadership, this country has run down its infrastructure and passed regressive taxes on future wage-earners to fund bloated middle-class entitlement programs; we have stimulated non-productive speculation in housing that has made it all but impossible for today's young to buy homes.

Worst of all, we have run up an enormous national debt rather than pay for the cost of our federal programs. The size of this mortgage on our nation's future is so staggering that the payments almost defy description.

For fiscal year 1985, for example, Congress will budget $67 billion more for interest payments on the national debt than we did in fiscal 1980. By fiscal 1989, continually-mounting deficits could raise the annual interest bill to $219 billion—$40 billion more than we currently pay for Social Security.

Now, the Treasury has come up with a dangerous new gimmick to help my generation avoid some of these interest payments altogether. Zero-coupon bonds would permit the government to borrow money on its promise to repay the lender all of the interest plus the principal. This "balloon payment" would come at the end of a bond's life, instead of the yearly "coupon" installments that most bonds require. With ZCBs we could borrow $1,000 at today's 13 percent interest rate and not have to make a single payment during the next 20 years. At the end of this period, our children, not we, would come up with $13,300. It's a deal our kids can't refuse.

Borrowing with ZCBs would not be so reprehensible if we actually used the money to make productive investments in America's future. But we would not. The vast majority of our tax and spending policies over-indulge the living comforts of every interest group and voting bloc that has the power to influence an election. The natural outflow of this process is government that imposes sacrifice only on those who are least able to resist.

I fear that history will one day show that Congress stopped representing the interest of all Americans in the mid-20th Century, and began kow-towing to a selfish generation of voters who wouldn't be taxed or part with their benefits. Perhaps it will reflect that the consequence of this short-sightedness was a bitter struggle between the generations. For when our children comprehend the legacy of encumbrance we have provided them, they will justifiably respond with anger and indignation.

I will lead the fight in Congress to see that the Treasury cannot use zero-coupon bonds to rip off our young. Yet, this is only the first of many steps Congress must take if it is to again represent the long-term national interest. American is at a crossroads. We can either rediscover the nobility of self-sacrifice, or plague our children with the ignoble consequences of our own shortsightedness and greed.

Sincerely,

DAVE DURENBERGER,
U.S. Senator.

S. 368

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That subsection (a) of section 1105 of title 31, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new clause:

"(26) a separate statement estimating the total interest which would accrue in the fiscal year for which the budget is submitted on all outstanding obligations issued on a discount basis under sections 3102 through 3104 of this title if such obligations had been issued on an interest-bearing basis."

By Mr. THURMOND:

S. 369. A bill to permit the enlistment of a limited number of aliens in the Regular Army of the United States; to the Commission on Armed Services.

PERMITTING LIMITED NUMBERS OF ALIENS TO ENLIST IN THE REGULAR ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I am today introducing legislation to grant temporary authority to the Secretary of the Army to enlist certain aliens into the Regular Army. The authority this bill would grant is limited to aliens who are between the ages of 18 and 35, and who have no dependents. Additionally, the authority granted would terminate on September 30, 1987, unless extended further through enactment of subsequent legislation.

The Secretary of the Army has been granted similar authority by Congress on previous occasions. When Eastern Europe fell to Soviet dominance following World War II, many freedom-loving Eastern Europeans fled their native lands to avoid Communist oppression. It became apparent to Congress that many of these refugees, with their linguistic and other skills, could perform a valuable service and bring knowledge to our military that could not otherwise be obtained.

Accordingly, Congress amended the law limiting enlistment to U.S. citizens, in order to permit the Secretary of the Army to enlist these refugees. Commonly known as the "Lodge Act," the legislation initially limited the alien enlistment authority given the Secretary of the Army to a 3-year period. However, it was subsequently twice extended by Congress. The Lodge Act also provided a mechanism whereby enlisted aliens, who rendered military service to this country could obtain, under certain conditions, permanent residence status in the United States. The legislation I am introducing today would also provide such a mechanism. Under the provisions of my bill, an alien enlisted pursuant to the measure who:

First, subsequently enters the United States (or any territory or possession of the United States) pursuant to military orders;

Second, is otherwise qualified for citizenship;

Third, has completed 5 or more years of active duty in the Regular Army; and Fourth, has been honorably discharged therefrom; shall be deemed to have been lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent residence within the meaning of section 316(a) of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1427(a)).

Mr. President, this legislation will not swing wide the doors of the Army to aliens desirous of coming to the United States. In addition to the limitations I have already mentioned, not more than 2,500 aliens would be allowed to enlist under this authority. Furthermore, the Secretary of the Army would be authorized, subject to approval by the Secretary of State, to issue regulations regarding the acceptance of alien enlistments and reenlistments.

Today, the continual efforts of Communist countries to expand their spheres of influence and subjugate free peoples of the world, have forced many individuals from their homelands. The experience knowledge, abilities, and strong anti-Communist beliefs of these refugees make many of them well suited to serve in the U.S. Army.

Mr. President, the Lodge Act resulted in the enlistment of aliens who proved to be dedicated individuals loyal to this country. In fact, there are service members in the Army today who enlisted under the provisions of that act. I believe the rationale for enactment of the Lodge Act over three decades ago is just as sound today, as I introduce this similar bill, and I urge my Senate colleagues to join me in supporting its swift consideration and passage.

By Mr. MELCHER (for himself, Mr. SARBANES, Mr. SIMON, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. LEVIN, and Mr. PRYOR):

S. 370. A bill to make available supplemental assistance for famine relief and recovery in Africa; to the Committee on Appropriations.

AFRICAN FAMINE RELIEF AND RECOVERY ACT OF 1985

● Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, Americans are understandably puzzled by the twin specters of huge piles of surplus agricultural commodities and the stark tragedy of starvation in Ethiopia. Yesterday I held a public meeting on the farm credit crisis now facing rural America. Unless immediate action is undertaken now, hundreds of thousands of those farmers and ranchers who have produced the agricultural bounty will be driven out of business. One of the themes that came throughout the meeting, however, is that credit is only a short-term solution. In the long term, farmers and ranchers need adequate prices for their product to survive. The administration spends time talking about a "market oriented" farm policy without talking about how best to develop those markets.

It is rare in public policy development that one has the chance to enter a proposal that is good for America, good for the world, and is simply the right thing to do. The African Famine Relief and Recovery Act of 1985 that I am introducing along with Senators SARBANES, SIMON, KENNEDY, MOYNIHAN, PRYOR, and LEVIN is such a proposal.

For the past several months the dramatic picture of starvation in Ethiopia has been brought to the attention of the American public. However, this situation has existed for a number of years and affects many other countries in Africa as well. In fact, reliable figures add up to as many as 50-million people in 27 countries who face the effects of serious famine without expanded American and international relief assistance.

Over the past 2 months the administration has reacted commendably in committing supplemental food aid. As recently as January 3, the President issued a major statement on African hunger relief. In that statement he pointed out that much of sub-Saharan Africa suffers increasingly from severe hunger, malnutrition, and starvation, and that a timely American response can save many lives.

The time is now. By the end of February the current pipeline of food aid will dry up without additional funding.

This legislation will provide a significant increase in funds for the Food for Peace Title II Program, as well as directing use of surplus commodities under section 416 of the Agriculture Act. As the world's largest food surplus producer, the United States has traditionally provided at least half of the international food assistance in emergencies.

Not only should those piles of commodities be used to feed people, but also history has shown that whenever America has assisted with meeting the food needs around the world, we have also developed markets for agricultural products when the economy of the recipient country recovers. The amount of surplus commodities we now have is immense. In fact, I would like to attach to the end of this statement the CCC Commodity Inventory as of January 1, 1985.

I think that it is high time that the Department of Agriculture started looking at food as something that is meant to feed people. Acquiring cheese in 500-pound barrels may make sense if your intent is simply to store it away until it is unpalatable. If, however, you would like to see people have access to that cheese, it should be in the form of smaller units. Not many families can use a 500-pound barrel.

In addition to the food aid, the bill will include funds for nonfood aid for projects to promote longer term recovery in the affected countries. This will include funding for rehabilitation programs, international disaster assistance, including emergency health needs, refugee assistance, and assistance with transportation, storage, and logistical problems affecting regular food aid programs.

The bill will also include a modest amount for improved planning, monitoring and supervision of the food aid to insure maximum utilization of the American assistance.

This effort has the support of every major private hunger relief organization in the country. A similar measure has been introduced in the House of Representatives and has over 100 cosponsors.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill which I am introducing today be printed in the RECORD at the close of my remarks.

The remaining funds shall be for emergency relief and recovery efforts in Africa by the Bureau for Refugee Programs of the Department of State and for use under the "African Resettlement Services and Facilities Project" for projects such as those proposed at the second International Conference on Assistance to Refugees in Africa (ICARA II).

GENERAL PROVISIONS

Funds appropriated by this title for "Public Law 480", for "Agriculture, Rural Development and Nutrition, Development Assistance" (other than funds for rehabilitation and recovery projects), and for "International Disaster Assistance" shall be available only for those countries in Africa which suffer during calendar year 1985 from exceptional food supply problems due to drought and other calamities (as determined by the World Food Program and the Food and Agriculture Organization), except that funds appropriated for "Public Law 480" may also be used to reimburse those ongoing title II programs from which fiscal year 1985 funds were transferred in order to provide emergency relief assistance in Africa.

In light of the severity and duration of this emergency, fiscal year 1985 funds may be carried into fiscal year 1986 and are in addition to funds appropriated for that year.

Funds appropriated by this title for "Agriculture, Rural Development and Nutrition, Development Assistance" for rehabilitation and recovery projects and funds appropriated by this title for "Migration and Refugee Assistance" shall be available only for those countries in Africa which have suffered in the last two years from exceptional food supply problems due to drought and other calamities (as determined by the World Food Program and the Food and Agriculture Organization).●

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, the tragedy of human starvation, in a world of plenty—which recently reached horrific dimensions in Ethiopia, and neighboring African nations—requires a response by the United States.

The continuing drought that has afflicted eight African nations in the past decade has put at risk an estimated 10 million human beings. Since October 1, 1984, the United States has shipped an estimated 700,000 metric tons of emergency food aid to famine-stricken regions of Africa. This is a good start, but it is not enough.

Today, I am proud to be an original cosponsor of the African Famine, Relief and Recovery Act of 1985. The situation is critical, and the Congress must act quickly if we are to avoid any worsening of an already tragic situation. Human lives are at stake.

This supplemental appropriations bill will provide food aid, and also will provide nonfood aid to promote longer term recovery in the affected countries. The United States must continue to work for the elimination of world hunger, both through actions in the Congress and through greater public awareness of this most persistent and real problem.●

S. 371. A bill to amend the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act to provide emergency farm credit assistance, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition and Forestry.

EMERGENCY FARM CREDIT ASSISTANCE ACT

● Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. President, our farmers and main street merchants, especially in the midcontinent region, are undergoing traumatic times.

It is no understatement to point out that it's a life-or-death matter as rural America struggles with the worst agricultural recession since the 1930's.

It is unfortunate that too many in pivotal leadership positions here in Washington are so insulated from the reality that is rural America today that they write regulations which ignore the true state of the problems. If they knew—or would take the time and interest to find out—they would be less complacent in working to do something about the situation beyond the confines of Washington, DC.

It is time that the leadership here wake up to the fact that this Nation's agricultural economy is in a desperate state—that they start to bring the forgotten economy of rural America back into the mainstream of economic thinking. Something has to be done before it is too late. Unfortunately, for far too many, it is already too late.

If those who write the regulations would become more aware of the plight of farmers and agri-businesses, rules such as those published last November 30 by the Farmers Home Administration would have been worded differently. The regulations lack the ingredients of compassion and understanding of the problems existing in rural America.

Words, not people are the major elements. Legalities, not reality, prevail. It is time we bring the people aspect back into government, into the writing of regulations. That, Mr. President, is the thrust of the legislation I am introducing today.

It puts compassion and understanding back into the Farmers Home loan process. It recognizes that there are human beings out beyond Washington, not inanimate objects. It recognizes the distressed state of the farm economy—not the failed logic of bureaucrats.

The Farmers Home rules as proposed last fall do not care whether people live or die, survive or go broke. The concern is what is best for government—for Washington.

The proposed rules would not recognize the distressed state of the farm economy as a circumstance beyond a borrower's control that could be a basis for loan deferral eligibility. My legislation says that the distressed state of the farm economy is justification enough for a borrower to obtain a loan deferral.

The proposed rules would eliminate current regulations which assure that Farmers Home borrowers receive family living and farm operating expenses as priority releases from farm production income. My legislation would change that. The priority would be to make certain that whatever the Government does, the farmer and his or her family will have something to eat—to survive—to have a roof over their heads, and importantly, put in this year's crop.

Main street businesses—those who extend short-term operating credit to farmers—need all the business they can get at this time.

Mr. President, as one person wrote to me in commenting on the proposed regulations:

The net effect of these changes on farmers and local business communities can be tragic. Proud, hard-working farm families are humiliated because they cannot maintain their households or their farms in a responsible way. Rural business communities lose the business they depend on for survival.

Mr. President, my legislation will return dignity to our agricultural sector. I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the legislation be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Emergency Farm Credit Assistance Act of 1985".

S. 372. A bill to amend the Mineral Lands Leasing Act of 1920, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resoruces.

FEDERAL COAL LEASING AMENDMENTS ACT

● Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, today I am introducing a bill to amend provisions of the Mineral Leasing Act of 1920 that relate to Federal coal leasing.

The Federal Government owns an estimated 50 percent of the Nation's coal. Despite this distinction, the Federal Coal Leasing Program has been embroiled in controversy for several years. In 1971, the Nixon administration imposed a moratorium on Federal coal leasing which lasted, in effect, until the Carter administration. At that time, under the direction of Secretary Andrus, the Federal Coal Leasing Management Program was put together in 1979. This long awaited framework occurred only after several lawsuits and after the enactment of the Federal Coal Leasing Amendments Act of 1976, a law which contained several provisions intended to provide a fair and effective mechanism for future leasing.

A leasing schedule resumed under the Reagan administration, but the program was once again brought to a halt—this time by a congressionally imposed moratorium—amid allegations of gross mismanagement. Congress also established the Commission on Fair Market Value Policy to examine the program and recommend changes to the Secretary of the Interior. The Commission's report, submitted almost a year ago, made 36 recommendations, virtually all of which were agreed upon by the Department.

The Department is currently in the process of instituting some of the recommended changes. However, others cannot be accomplished without legislation. My bill addresses this need. It would first, modify existing diligent development provisions for leases issued both prior to and after August 4, 1976; second, define by law certain critical terms; third, eliminate the 3-year requirement for submittal of the operation and reclamation plan; fourth, provide for automatic royalty rate increases upon the date of lease readjustment; fifth, allow lessees to relinquish undisturbed pre-1976 leases; sixth, prohibit the leasing of new production tracts unless competition is present; seventh, provide for experimentation with negotiated sale of leases for captive tracts; eighth, require GAO to monitor the program; and ninth, require lessees to report to the Department the financial terms of lease assignments.

The provisions that I expect will generate the most interest relate to the diligent development of Federal coal leases issued both prior to and after August 4, 1976. Current law—section 3 of the Federal Coal Leasing Amendments Act of 1976—provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall not issue additional Federal leases for any leasable mineral to a lessee who has held a Federal coal lease for 10 years without producing coal in commercial quantities. For leases issued prior to August 4, 1976, this 10-year period expires on August 3, 1986. Because this provision applies to all leasable minerals subject to the act, it has significance not only for coal lessees interested in acquiring or holding coal reserves, but also for potential development of oil and gas.

As this 10-year deadline approaches, there has been a growing consensus that Congress should modify section 3. This provision is regarded by many as too punitive for lessees who have made a good-faith effort to develop the reserves under lease. Some leases have remained undeveloped because of a lack of diligence on the part of the lessee, or because they were acquired for speculation; however, others have remained dormant for reasons beyond the control of the lessee. Factors such as a slack-coal market, limited access to transportation, difficult mine configuration, and various environmental logistics have slowed or prevented development of many noncompliance leases.

If Congress does not modify section 3 it will be extremely disruptive to the energy market. Not only will it affect the mineral development and energy-producing sectors of this country, but, in turn, it will affect the utilities and consumers that depend on them. A 1981 report by the Office of Technology Assessment substantiates this disturbing prognosis in its estimate that two-thirds of the lessees in the West hold at least one lease that is unlikely to meet the diligent development deadline. It is clear that the companies who stand to lose the most from this restriction are the multimineral developers.

My bill would limit the section 3 ban on acquiring new mineral leases to coal only—so that lessees who do not produce coal in commercial quantities would be eligible to lease other minerals such as oil and gas. It would provide lessees with noncompliance pre-1976 coal leases, two options for acquiring additional leases: First, turnback; or second, payment of a rental fee.

The turnback option would allow lessees with these leases to obtain new leases if they relinquish undeveloped leases containing equal coal tonnage. In lieu of the turnback, those lessees who hold no more than two noncompliance leases may elect to pay a per acre rental fee on each acre acquired under a new lease. The rental fee would be assessed according to the density of the coal tract in the newly acquired tract. Tracts would be divided into three tonnage classes and assessed as follows: 0–100 million tons at $25 per acre; 100–300 million tons at $35 per acre; and over 300 million tons at $45 per acre.

Additionally, this bill addresses the issue of lease development for leases issued after August 4, 1976. Current law provides that these leases must be producing in commercial quantities—defined by Interior regulations as 1 percent of the recoverable reserves—within 10 years after lease issuance, or the lease is terminated. This 10-year period appears minimally sufficient under the most favorable mine development conditions. However, in a situation where there are delays because of special permitting problems, this time period is simply too short to bring the mine on line.

I advocate providing the lessee with a more flexible approach: through the payment of an advance escalating royalty he may extend his lease for up to 10 additional years. This provision distinguished the serious lessee from the idle speculator who is unlikely to pay an additional finance charge on a lease he has no serious intention of developing.

This bill also makes several changes that would clarify the implementation and administration of the Federal Coal Management Program. It would define by law the concepts of "commercial quantities," "diligent development," and "continued operation." These terms are currently defined only in the Department's regulations. My bill essentially retains these definitions as they now stand. Clarifying their meaning in the law will eliminate the ambiguity frequently associated with their application in implementing the Mineral Leasing Act.

The remaining provisions in my proposal are tied directly to recommendations made by the congressionally established Commission on Fair Market Value Policy for Federal Coal Leasing. These items are necessary to further restore public confidence in the program—a vital step to getting the program started up again. Included among these is a requirement that the General Accounting Office monitor the Federal coal leasing program over the next 5 years and submit a semiannual report to the Congress on the administration's activities under the program. The bill would also mandate a criminal penalty for the disclosure of proprietary data by a Federal employee.

A successful Federal coal program is essential to this country's future as a reliable supplier of energy both in the world export market and in our own domestic market. In 1984, 55.3 percent of the net electricity produced in this country was generated from coal. According to the Department of Energy, this figure is expected to rise to 57 percent in 1985. To meet this demand, we need to insure a steady new domestic supply of this abundant resource. And this depends on a stable, responsible Federal coal program.

Congress must do its part in getting this program back on sound footing. The coal industry needs legislation this year so that they have the necessary time to make management planning decisions regarding which leases to hold onto and which ones to relinquish.

I see this proposal as the genesis for a new and optimistic beginning for the Federal program. I urge my colleagues to join me as cosponsors of this measure. Let us work together to make any necessary changes to the bill to reflect particular concerns. In particular I am eager for the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources to move promptly to schedule hearings on this bill.●

S. 374. A bill to provide authorization of appropriations for the U.S. Travel and Tourism Administration; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

U.S. TRAVEL AND TOURISM ADMINISTRATION APPROPRIATION AUTHORIZATION

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I am pleased to introduce, for myself and my colleagues who have joined as cosponsors, authorizing legislation for the U.S. Travel and Tourism Administration [USTTA].

This legislation will provide an authorization of $15 million for the USTTA for fiscal year 1986, consistent with the blueprint unanimously approved by this body 2 years ago. This modest funding level is more than justified by the increasing importance of travel and tourism to the American economy and by the outstanding work the USTTA has done since it was created by the National Tourism Policy Act (Public Law 97–63) in 1981.

I remind my colleagues that this bill reflects the overwhelming support for the USTTA expressed by the Senate in the 98th Congress with the unanimous passage of legislation to authorize the USTTA at levels of $13 million, $14 million, and $15 million for the respective fiscal years 1984 through 1986. I urge you all to join me in reaffirming this support and asking our friends in the House of Representatives to work with us to provide an appropriate authorization for the USTTA.

Certainly, the size of the travel and tourism industry warrants the attention of the Federal Government. Tourism is the third largest retail industry in the United States and 1 of the top 3 employers in 39 States, including my home State of South Dakota where tourism is our second largest industry. The industry employs nearly 5 million Americans and generates over $40 billion per year in wages. As the health of our economy becomes increasingly dependent upon service industries, travel and tourism become even more important to American prosperity and employment. We need a strong Federal commitment to international tourism promotion in order to maximize employment, minimize our trade deficit, and begin keeping pace with our western competitors who have vastly outspent us on tourism promotion and consequently have cut deeply into our share of worldwide tourism revenues.

While the Senate has steadfastly backed the USTTA since its creation, the agency has never attained the level of funding that we all supported in the 98th Congress. Since the USTTA was created, strict budgetary restraints have been imposed by the administration, and Federal budget officials have cited the USTTA's lack of a comprehensive plan for utilizing additional funds as a reason for balking at funding increases. The administration has argued that the tourism industry should be responsible for promoting itself.

As a result of these restraints, USTTA's budget languished at about $8 million per year during the early 1980's. Meanwhile, as I have mentioned, other western nations were spending much more on international tourism promotion. In 1983, for instance, Mexico spent $182 million, Greece spent $69 million, Spain spent $61 million, and Canada spent $39 million. Given these figures, one can see why our share of international tourism revenues dropped from 13 percent in 1976 to 10.6 percent in 1982.

I am pleased to say that the USTTA has benefited during the past year from the bolstered support of the administration, the Congress, and the travel and tourism industry. Without question, much of this support has been generated by Mrs. Donna Tuttle, the Under Secretary of Commerce for Travel and Tourism. Since her appointment in December of 1983, Mrs. Tuttle has worked continuously to highlight the importance of tourism within the Federal Government, State and local governments, and to unify the travel industry in cooperative private sector involvement with the USTTA. Congress responded with a fiscal year 1985 appropriation of $12 million for the USTTA, the largest Federal tourism promotion budget in this decade, but still far below our earlier international tourism promotion funding levels of the 1970's, and only a fraction of that spent by our competitors who are gaining an increasing share of the international market. We need to fight back.

I am pleased to see that the travel and tourism industry has taken an active, cooperative role in working with the USTTA in its promotional efforts. Top marketing executives from all segments of the industry devoted their time and resources over a 1-year period, developing an international tourism marketing plan, in conjunction with the USTTA. The industry has contributed funding and resources to a number of new marketing and advertising initiatives sponsored by the USTTA. Through these initiatives, we have reached new markets in Canada and elsewhere for the first time. The USTTA is on the threshold of unveiling a new advertising program to promote America overseas—which will be released next week, February 5–6, during the City/State Days Program sponsored by the USTTA to assist State and local governments in tourism promotion efforts.

Finally, Mr. President, there was another event last year that encouraged me perhaps even more than those I have already discussed. The Republican Party, at its 1984 convention, adopted the following language in the party platform:

> In a continuing effort to offset our balance of trade, we reaffirm our strong support for this Nation's tourism industry.

Last February, the President met with a number of tourism leaders from Congress, the administration and the private sector to sign a Presidential proclamation designating a "National Tourism Week" and recognizing the economic importance of this industry.

Clearly, the USTTA has a broader base of support today than ever before, and I look forward to helping translate this support into a USTTA budget that reflects the importance of the industry to the Nation.

Recently, however, I have learned that the Administration's budget planners have different ideas for the USTTA. In their admirable attempt to reduce the Federal deficit, they have apparently targeted the USTTA for major budget cuts. While I share their desire to reduce the deficit, I do not see how cutting the USTTA will do so. Deficits are not reduced by cutting an agency that generates $18 in revenues for every dollar spent. Negative trade balances are not offset by allowing competitors to dominate the marketing of a product for which each percent of market share represents more than $1 billion. The economy is not bolstered by abandonment of a commitment to an industry that employs nearly 5 million people and generates over 1 billion tax dollars per year.

If deficit reduction is the objective, as I am certain it is, cutting the USTTA budget simply does not make sense. Indeed, given the remarkable return on investment figures, a huge budget cut will increase rather than reduce our Federal deficit.

I would like to invite my colleagues to learn more about the USTTA's activities. As part of the USTTA's City/State Days, a congressional luncheon has been scheduled on Wednesday, February 6, in room SR-325. This luncheon provides a unique opportunity for Members of Congress to discuss travel and tourism with their constituents, USTTA representatives, and one another. I hope that my colleagues will join me at the luncheon and in sponsoring this legislation, so that we can maximize the economic and cultural benefits of international travel to and within the United States.

In closing, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the attached printout, entitled "State Tourism Impact Statistics—1982," be printed in the RECORD immediately following my remarks so my colleagues can see the economic impact of the travel and tourism industry in their States. I also ask unanimous consent that the attached "Budgets of the National Tourist Offices of Selected Countries—1983" be printed in the RECORD to illustrate how far we in the United States are outspent in this area. I again urge my colleagues to join us in cosponsoring this important legislation, and in pushing for its swift passage in the Senate.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. Res. 33. A joint resolution to authorize and request the President to designate May 12, 1985 to June 16, 1985, as "Family Reunion Month"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

FAMILY REUNION MONTH

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, the joint resolution which I am introducing today would authorize and request the President to proclaim the period from Mother's Day to Father's Day 1985 as "Family Reunion Month." Those holidays are occasions when Americans traditionally recognize and celebrate the importance of the family. I believe it is an appropriate time for us in Congress to encourage the reaffirmation of family ties and the reunion of estranged family members.

Each year thousands, probably millions, of Americans become personally acquainted with the grief and anxiety which occur when one of their family members is missing. No records exist to document how many runaways and driftaways leave home every year or how many Americans disappear as victims of foul play. The evidence, however, indicates that the problem is a serious one. It is believed that over 1.8 million children disappear annually. This figure does not account for the hundreds of adults who are discovered missing each day. The magnitude of the problem identifies it as legitimate national concern.

This resolution, like the one Congress passed and the President signed into law last year, would encourage runaways and driftaways to utilize the networks which currently exist, largely through volunteer organizations and the private sector, to reestablish contact with their families. It would encourage families to honor the individual's effort to communicate.

Last year during "Family Reunion Month," a number of young people were reunited with their families. In 1 week alone, 67 children took advantage of Trailways' Free Ride Home Program, "Operation: Home Free." If by focusing on the issue of missing family members, we foster the creation of similar programs or encourage the reunion of one family, it will be worth the effort. I encourage all my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring and supporting this resolution to designate May 12, 1985 to June 16, 1985 as "Family Reunion Month."

S.J. Res. 34. A joint resolution to designate the week of October 6, 1985, through October 12, 1985, as "National Children's Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL CHILDREN'S WEEK

● Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, today I am introducing with my colleagues, Senators LUGAR, MATTINGLY, and NUNN, a resolution to designate the week of October 6 through October 12, 1985, as "National Children's Week."

While recognizing many important causes through commemorative resolutions, we sometimes overlook what is often closest to our hearts. National Children's Week seeks to focus our hearts and our energies on our children—our own, if we have them—on the children of the less fortunate, on the children without families, or those who may be in need. Children growing up today face many emotional and physical dangers—from a wrenching divorce, to lack of adequate nourishment, to experimentation with drugs. We hope every child is given the benefits of a strong family unit, and good guidance through childhood, but unfortunately these days, that does not always occur. When a child is set loose, without a caring family or wise restrictions, the result is often juvenile delinquency or drug abuse in later years. National Children's Week hopes to help children by focusing attention on the need for strong family support in childhood and on how the community can help families and children.

The first National Children's Week was celebrated in 1981 by concerned citizens and child advocacy groups in several States including Indiana and Georgia, which have been very active in publicizing the celebration. Since 1981, more and more States are sponsoring Children's Week activities and focusing attention on some of the problems facing children and youth.

During Children's Week, advocacy groups, parents, community organizations, and the business community conduct numerous events to heighten public awareness and increase volunteer participation in child and youth projects. Activities focus on the inadequacy of infant health care, youth alcohol and drug abuse, child abuse, juvenile justice, and assistance for disadvantaged and handicapped children.

Our children are our future and our most precious resource. If we can help them and their families with support, and encouragement, and caring, we will be building a stronger nation. Please join with me and Senator LUGAR, Senator MATTINGLY, and Senator NUNN in support of National Children's Week.●

● Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my distinguished colleague from Indiana in cosponsoring the joint resoluton to designate the week beginning October 6, 1985, as "National Children's Week."

Children's Week is a familiar occasion for the citizens of my home State of Georgia. For the past few years, the week has been celebrated in Atlanta. Because Atlanta's experience has been so successful, it has been replicated in Macon, GA, for 3 years. This copycatting of the celebration is what its originators had in mind and what a National Children's Week would encourage on a large scale throughout the country. In Georgia, a private foundation has underwritten the production of a Children's Week guidebook which is designed to aid other communities organizing Children's Week activities.

The purpose of Children's Week is to focus on the special needs of our Nation's 65 million children, to provide information about services available in the community to meet these unique needs, and to encourage the involvement of volunteers in the delivery of these services. The success of Children's Week in Atlanta has been dependent on the cooperation of the public and private sectors. Volunteer agencies, small local and large national firms, and public agencies—groups which offer a wide variety of services to meet the diverse needs of our children—have come together during children's week to demonstrate their dedication to a common goal. That goal is to assist our children, the Nation's most precious resource, in developing into mature and responsible adults. It is a purpose, I believe, worthy of our recognition and support, for that which benefits our children ultimately benefits the entire Nation.

I urge my colleagues to support this resolution requesting the President to proclaim the week of October 6–12, 1985, as National Children's Week.●

● Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleague from Indiana, Senator QUAYLE, as a cosponsor of a joint resolution designating the week of October 6, through October 12, 1985, as "National Children's Week." This week will highlight the needs of children and the community services available to assist them.

In 1981, a dedicated group of citizens from Atlanta, GA, celebrated the first Children's Week. The success of that first effort led several organizations to conclude that Children's Week should become an annual event to publicize services for children. The week of October 6 through 12 will mark the fifth year for Children's Week in Atlanta. Activities during past celebrations have included a fun run for children 14 and under, a balloon launch, a child advocacy forum, and several shopping mall exhibits which highlighted not only services available for children but also ways that adults may become personally involved in programs to help children.

The success of Children's Week in metropolitan Atlanta and the passage of a resolution to establish National Children's Week during October 1984 prompted other communities within Georgia and in several other States to develop their own observances. It is my hope that the designation of National Children's Week for the second consecutive year will continue a nationwide examination of the needs of children and the ways that all citizens may become involved in efforts to assist children. As the resolution states, children are our Nation's "most precious resource and its greatest hope for the future."

I hope all of my colleagues will join in support of National Children's Week.●

By Mr. GORTON:

S.J. Res. 35. Joint resolution to authorize and request the President to issue a proclamation designating April 21 through April 27, 1985, as "National Organ Donation Awareness Week;" to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL ORGAN DONATION AWARENESS WEEK

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, it is my great pleasure today to introduce a Senate Joint Resolution calling on the President to proclaim April 21 through April 27, 1985, as "National Organ Donation Awareness Week;" Congressman SID MORRISON is introducing the companion measure today in the House of Representatives, and I ask my colleagues to join us in supporting this legislation.

This effort builds on the 1983 resolution, Public Law 98-99, and subsequent Presidential Proclamation declaring April 22 through April 28, 1984 as "National Organ Donation Awareness Week;" It traces back to the pioneering work of the Organ Association in Washington State. The Organ Donation Association came together in 1976 as a partnership of the Lions Eye Bank, Northwest Kidney Foundation, the Washington State Medical Association Auxiliary, and others. The Organ Donation Association organized a statewide "Organ Donation Awareness Week;" in 1981, and the idea has spread to most of the States of the Union.

Many Americans whose kidneys, eyes, hearts, lungs, bone, skin, or other tissues and organs are unable to sustain them can be helped or cured through organ transplants. Through organ donation, those who care and have foresight may, when they die, give the gift of life and living to those in need. Since the passage of the Uniform Anatomical Gift Act in 1968, every State has legally recognized the organ donor card, in hopes that its citizens will make an anatomical gift upon death, as Mrs. Gorton and I have pledged to do. A donor may pledge any needed organs or parts; only specified organs or parts; or may donate his or her body for anatomical study.

Research by the National Kidney Foundation indicates that more than 100,000 Americans a year could benefit from an organ transplant if donors were available. About 6,000 Americans received kidney transplants in 1983, but that was less than half the number of people waiting for one. In my own Washington State, the Organ Donation Association reports that there were 104 kidney transplants and about 500 cornea transplants in 1984, and that many more could have been done had donors been available.

I am sure that all of my colleagues have received letters from their constituents describing the pain, trauma, and frustration that families go through in seeking suitable organs for transplantation. We all know too well the many cases where lack of public awareness complicates the search, and how simple it is to make an anatomical gift by signing and carrying the Uniform Donor Card. State, local, and national groups are coordinating their efforts to promote "National Organ Donation Awareness Week" in 1985, and I anticipate that my House and Senate colleagues will be hearing from these dedicated people in their own States in the next few weeks. I welcome my colleagues' support and their cosponsorship of the joint resolution.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the Senate joint resolution be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

APPROPRIATIONS STATUS REPORT

● Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I believe it would be useful as we begin the 99th Congress to bring up to date the tables on fiscal year 1985 appropriation actions that I have inserted in the RECORD over the past several months. I ask to have printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks a summary table showing Appropriations Committee spending activities through the end of the second session of the 98th Congress.

The summary table shows the effect of all actions that impact on fiscal year 1985, that is, outlays from prior-year budget authority and other actions completed in prior years; the regular appropriation bills, the final continuing resolution, and supplementals which were enacted during the second session; possible later requirements, primarily for the Federal pay raise that went into effect on January 1, 1985, and certain entitlement programs; and adjustments to keep mandatory programs at the levels assumed in the budget resolution.

Compared to the section 302(a) "crosswalk" allocation to the Appropriations Committee under the fiscal year 1985 budget resolution, the committee is under its crosswalk allocation by $5.1 billion in budget authority and $1.3 billion in outlays.

Mr. President, I commend the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, my distinguished colleague Senator HATFIELD, for the committee's efforts last year. It was a challenging year as the Senate sought to make a substantial downpayment on reducing the Federal deficits. The Senate Appropriations Committee, under the able chairmanship of Senator HATFIELD, worked hard to stay within the guidelines of the Senate deficit reduction package and the budget resolution. The committee was successful in staying within these guidelines and was instrumental in helping the Congress achieve its deficit reduction goals.

I commend Chairman HATFIELD, the esteemed members of the Appropriations Committee, and my distinguished Senate colleagues for a tough job well done.

The table referred to is as follows:

SUMMARY OF SENATE APPROPRIATIONS ACTION TO DATE FOR FISCAL YEAR 1985

[In billions of dollars]

	Fiscal year 1985
	Budget authority	Outlays
Outlays from prior-years and other actions	9.0	190.5

MILITARY MEDICAL CARE NEEDS TO BE IMPROVED

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, the military health care system operated by the Department of Defense consists of 470 hospitals and clinics in the continental United States and overseas. There are over 12,000 Medical Corps officers plus thousands of support staff to provide health care to over 2 million active duty service members, their families, and the retired military population. The mission of the military health care system is not only to insure the health and well-being of the military community, but in times of war it must be ready to care for our fighting personnel.

Medical care is one of the benefits provided to our service members for their service to the Nation. Their health and that of their families is critical to the national security of the United States because a soldier who is healthy has a good morale and makes a better soldier. Part of that good morale is the soldier's confidence that the care he and his family receives is the best that can be found.

In the last several years several constituents who serve in the military as well as the group, Citizens Against Military Injustice, have brought to my attention problems with the military health care system. In one case, a career Navy petty officer was diagnosed for congestive heart failure, but placed back on active duty. Several weeks later he went to a military treatment facility and was given a drug known to cause problems for heart patients; subsequently, his condition deteriorated rapidly and he died. In another case, which is still ongoing, a sailor has been in and out of four military hospitals and had eight operations in the front of his face. His condition has not improved substantially and at the present time he has no skull bone above his eyes from ear to ear. While it has not been determined that there is malpractice in this case, it does appear that his medical records are not complete and may have been tampered with.

Of course, no hospital can have a perfect record of care. However, further examination of the military health care system indicates that the military has experienced problems in attracting doctors; that there has been insufficient recordkeeping by military doctors; that there are problems with credentialing and with licensing of military physicians;

As a result of these problems Senator PELL and I have requested that the General Accounting Office investigate the quality of health care in the Department of Defense. This study was initiated in February of 1984.

At the same time that the General Accounting Office began its investigation, the Department of Defense inspector general was conducting a similar audit. An interim report released by the inspector general's office showed some serious systematic problems. Some of these problems were:

That credential committees did not have standard criteria to appraise physicians.

That temporary privileges had expired before full privileges had been granted in 35 of 149 cases, or 23 percent.

That letters of recommendations verifying the provider's capabilities, information which is required by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals, were not obtained in 388 of 461 cases, or 84 percent.

That full privileges had expired before renewal in 153 of 205 cases, or 75 percent. At five hospitals, eight providers were practicing with expired privileges for as long as 6 months. This violated the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals' standards.

At six hospitals visited, 435 emergency room records were reviewed. Of those records, 374 or 86 percent had illigible notations, missing records, or both.

The Army, the Navy, and the Air Force have all conducted audits of quality assurance at their facilities. Similar problems have been discovered by all the services.

While the Department of Defense Health Affairs Office has assured me that steps are being implemented to correct these matters, it is important to note that all the deficiencies reported all violated existing regulations as well as standards of the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals. These audit reports all seem to point to systematic problems that impair the military's ability to provide the highest possible level of quality of care to our service members and their families.

During the coming months Congress will need to ensure that corrective steps to improve military health care are implemented. The Congress should examine the medical branches of the services to ensure that commanding officers who are not diligent in pursuing problems are held accountable. In addition, the Congress should examine the compensation system currently in place to determine if it adequately compensates members and their families who are the victims of malpractice. And, finally, the Feres doctrine, which prohibits active duty service members from suing the Government for injuries like malpractice, should be evaluated to determine if it is just and fair to the service member.

I ask that the following articles which have appeared lately about the problems of military medicine be entered into the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

CONGRESS ANXIOUS ABOUT MILITARY HOSPITALS' CARE

(By Philip M. Boffey)

WASHINGTON, January 15.—Military medical leaders and Congressional staffs are giving increased attention to the quality of care at military hospitals as a result of reports challenging the professional performance of some military doctors.

The latest incident involves the suspension of the chief heart surgeon at the Naval Hospital in Bethesda, Md., which has treated President Reagan for minor ailments, as well as other high ranking officials.

Pentagon health officers are scheduled to brief the staffs of the Senate and House Armed Services Committees Wednesday on steps the services have been taking to improve and insure the quality of care.

The briefing, being held at the request of the Pentagon, comes after a series of military audit reports documenting deficiencies in the quality assurance program at military hospitals and after news reports about particular cases.

SUSPENSION IN NOVEMBER

The surgeon suspended at Bethesda was identified today by a Navy spokesman as Comdr. Donal Billig, who headed the cardiothoracic surgery unit at the hospital until Nov. 28, when his surgical and clinical privileges were suspended for an inquiry.

Efforts to reach Commander Billig today proved unavailing. A message left with his answering service at home was unanswered, and public relations officials at the Naval Medical Command and the Naval Hospital declined to rely messages to him.

The Navy said simply that concerns had been raised about his "technical performance" as chief of his unit. The cardiothoracic surgery unit had been operating with a staff of three surgeons and two surgical residents and had been performing 170 operations a year, according to Lieut. Alan Goldstein, a spokesman for the Naval Medical Command.

NO HAMPERING OF SERVICE SEEN

Lieutenant Goldstein said that suspension of the unit's head "has not hampered" services of the hospital. He declined to provide information about the rate of surgical mortality in the cardiothoracic unit at the hospital.

Congressional interest in the issue has been stimulated by military audits documenting problems in a sampling of military hospitals. Last year, the Defense Department's Inspector General issued a report criticizing health care procedures at six military hospitals, two each from the Army, Navy and Air Force. It found deficiencies in the way decisions were made to grant doctors the right to operate in the hospitals, in emergency room functions and in the supervision of physician assistants.

At two hospitals, for example, when staff members challenged the quality of care given by two doctors, neither the hospital commanders nor credentials committees took firm action. Similar audits by the Navy and the Army found defects in their own hospitals.

Senator Jim Sasser, Democrat of Tennessee, has also requested an investigation by the General Accounting Office, an investigative arm of Congress. A staff aide said the Senator's concern had been raised by the cases of two constituents who suffered "grievous malpractice" injuries at the hands of military doctors.

DEFECTS REPORTED IN MILITARY CARE—PROBLEM IN EVALUATING DOCTORS FOUND IN THREE HEALTH AUDITS

(By Philip M. Boffey)

WASHINGTON, January 17.—Three internal audits of the military medical care system have reported serious deficiencies in appointing and evaluating doctors in the military.

The audits also found that emergency rooms of military hospitals were often staffed by unqualified personnel, that lax drug-dispensing systems allowed some doctors to prescribe drugs for themselves or for friends, and that poorly supervised physicians' assistants sometimes gave improper care without bothering to refer patients to doctors.

The problems with military medical care have come to light as the Defense Department's top military and health officials focused renewed attention on the need to assure the quality of care dispensed in the military hospitals.

The most serious challenges to the Defense Department's medical system were raised by the three internal audits. These audits, by the Defense Department's Inspector General, the Naval Audit Service and the Army Audit Agency, were completed last year and were made available this week by the office of Senator Jim Sasser, Democrat of Tennessee, who became interested in military medical care because of complaints from constituents.

At a meeting with the officials this week, Defense Secretary Caspar W. Weinberger "stated clearly and emphatically that he expects the quality of military health care to be of the highest possible standard," Dr. William Mayer, Assistant Secretary of Defense for health affairs, said in a statement.

Dr. Mayer said Secretary Weinberger had told those at the meeting that health care was a "top priority" and that whenever medical mischance or accident occurred "he expects a rapid, appropriate and decisive response by the responsible officials of the military departments."

A delegation from the Pentagon's health affairs office briefed staff members of the House and Senate Armed Services Committees Wednesday on "steps the Defense Department had taken to improve medical quality assurance over the past year and answered questions about recent news reports critical of the medical system.

The three internal audits found that doctors were often given credentials, or the authority to practice, at military facilities with little checking of their qualifications. The Pentagon audit, for example, found that letters of recommendation verifying the doctor's capabilities were not obtained in 84 percent of 461 cases reviewed. One hospital's credentials committee took only 40 minutes to recommend the authority to practice for 86 individuals, the audit found.

The Army audit found that 362 of 366 doctors' files checked did not contain the required information on training and experience. As one result, two military doctors who had not obtained credentials at their previous assignments were granted full and unrestricted authority to practice at a new post, which had mistakenly assumed that they had credentials. Similarly, the Navy audit found two civilian physicians serving at one hospital had never been granted credentials at all.

VARIETY OF FACILITIES

Health care is furnished by the military services in a variety of treatment facilities, ranging from large hospitals such as the Naval Hospital in Bethesda, Md., which often treats Presidents and other dignitaries, to small treatment facilities at rural sites. The services employ both military and civilian doctors and care for a mixture of active duty personnel, retirees, dependents and eligible civilians. The three audits concentrated on some of the more significant treatment centers.

All the audits said military health officials were taking steps to rectify the problems found. And a chronology of "quality assurance initiatives" supplied to Congress by the Pentagon indicated a number of changes to improve medical care.

The audits also found that doctors whose care of patients had been criticized by other doctors or health personnel sometimes escaped any loss of privileges to practice or any adverse reference in their files. The Navy audit found that hospital staff members were reluctant to file reports on unusual or questionable medical incidents and unexplained deaths lest their relationship with the doctor be strained or their medical judgment questioned.

UNDUE PRIVILEGES GIVEN

The Army audit said that senior medical personnel were sometimes not called to account or were given undue medical privileges because of their rank and power.

Auditors also found that the civilian physician-licensing authorities were sometimes not told about restrictions imposed on doctors who were leaving military practice. The Pentagon audit, for example, found that a civilian doctor working for the Air Force, whose privileges to practice had been suspended because of allegations of sexual misconduct with a patient, had the privileges reinstated the day before he resigned from the hospital staff. He thereby avoided a requirement that the suspension be reported to civilian medical boards, according to the audit.

SOME DOCTORS COMPLAINED

Emergency room defects, a prime focus of previous audits, were found to be a serious and continuing problem in some of the audits. The Navy's audit found that emergency room medical staffs were often untrained in emergency medicine or of questionable competence. One patient died after an intern on duty in an emergency room discharged him despite tests with abnormal results. Another died because the emergency room officer was unskilled in managing breathing problems.

The Pentagon audit reported that some doctors assigned to emergency room duties complained that they were unqualified for the job.

Malpractice claims against military medical facilities and doctors have been rising even faster than claims against their civilian counterparts. Medical malpractice claims filed against all three military services jumped from 638 in the fiscal year 1981 to 915 in the fiscal 1983, an increase of about 43 percent, according to military figures supplied to Congress. The increase in the civilian malpractice claims filed between 1981 and 1983 was about 33 percent, as reported by the American Medical Association and the insurance industry.

The malpractice claims against military facilities did not include claims by active duty personnel, who are generally not eligible to sue the Government.

CHIEF BETHESDA SURGEON'S SUSPENSION IS LATEST MILITARY HEALTH CARE DISPUTE

WASHINGTON.—The chief heart surgeon at the Navy's showcase hospital in Bethesda has been stripped of his surgical and clinical privileges pending a review of what has been described as an abnormally high surgical death rate in the hospital's cardio-thoracic unit.

The physician, who was not identified, was suspended from the surgical floor in late November of last year and assigned to duties outside patient care, a spokesman at Bethesda confirmed Friday.

"The action was based on concerns as to this doctor's technical performance which arose through the ongoing process of the quality assurance program," the spokesman said.

A Navy investigation of the suspension and the incidents leading to it is expected to be completed within the next two to three months. As a part of the investigation, the physician will be permitted to testify and present evidence in his behalf, the spokesman said.

The suspension comes when the entire military's health care delivery system has been drawing fire. The Department of Defense's own Inspector General's office is looking into the quality control of health care within the services. Those investigations, apparently at the direction of Secretary of Defense Caspar W. Weinberger, are nearing completion and should be released soon.

Several Pentagon and Congressional officials have indicated that the preliminary findings of the inspector's office are critical of the military's health care system.

Senator Jim Sasser (D, Tenn.) has also asked that the General Accounting Office (GAO) conduct its own investigation of the quality of health care given members of the armed services. A staff aide to Mr. Sasser said the senator called for the probe after receiving a large number of constituent complaints from retired and active duty military personnel about their health care.

The Bethesda Naval Hospital investigation apparently began after concerns rose over "a greater than should be expected" number of surgical deaths in the cardio-thoracic unit. The decision to lift the privileges of the head surgeon apparently came after a study by an outside expert called in by the Navy.

The incident was reminiscent of a similar investigation four years ago at the Air Force's largest hospital, the Wilford Hall Medical Center in San Antonio, Texas.

There, the Air Force's chief heart surgeon at the time, Col. William Stanford, was found to have a surgical mortality rate of over 40 percent of his patients, a figure well above the national average.

When Colonel Stanford was transfered to a civilian hospital in Milwaukee for brushup training, he incorrectly hooked a heart-lung machine to a woman patient, causing her to suffer permanent brain damage. A lawsuit against the government later determined that the Air Force had not informed the Milwaukee hospital group of Colonel Stanford's mortality rates.

AN IMPOSTER'S ODYSSEY IN MEDICINE

(By Kathleen Kerr)

For 15 years, Abraham V.K. Asante practiced medicine, posing as a medical student and physician, all the while caring for patients and winning praise from Army officers.

Equipped with bogus credentials in 1968, Asante began an odyssey through East Coast hospitals, including Nassau County Medical Center in East Meadow. Evidence presented at a congressional subcommittee on health care earlier this month has revealed that Asante continued his charade until 1983, although medical authorities knew of his false credentials as early as 1974. Finally, last April, Asante was convicted of charges that he caused brain damage to a patient at a Fort Dix, N.J., hospital, where he posed as an anesthesiologist.

Asante's brief association with the Nassau County Medical Center in 1977 was disclosed for the first time by the subcommittee. "He was never employed," hospital spokesman Ed Smith said. "We did a very careful check, and we discovered he didn't have the proper credentials." Smith said Asante, formerly of Roosevelt, observed surgery for several months as an "extern," but that he never treated patients.

* * * The lack of an adequate reporting system allowed Asante to slip through the cracks; there was not way for medical officials, like those at Nassau County Medical Center, to warn medical institutions throughout the country. Although the Federation of State Medical Boards of the United States keeps a computer bank of licensed physicals who have been disciplined, there is no nationwide list of those with phony credentials as medical doctors. Asante claimed that he was a medical doctor, not a licensed physician.

Asante came to the United States from Ghana and said he was a doctor with a degree from Charles University's Medical School in Czechoslovakia. In 1974, Asante showed his phony degree to the Educational Commission for Foreign Medical Graduates, which administers tests for hospital residency and state licensure to foreign students. Commission officials confirmed their suspicions that his degree was phony and warned two hospitals where Asante had applied for internships.

"Although his name was on it [the degree], there were a number of defects in it," said Dr. Ray Casterline, vice president of the commission.

In 1975, the Army hired Asante as chief medical officer at its Buffalo station, but he did not have the state license that the Army began requiring in 1976. Asante's phony degree had fooled the Army, but he was terminated when he could not produce a license. Still, he received a glowing recommendation.

"At all times, Dr. Asante has demonstrated the highest levels . . . of medical knowledge . . .," Lieut. Col. George Helsel wrote.

From 1978 to 1981, Asante was a house physician at the Brooklyn Jewish Hospital. Hospital spokesman Lars Larmon said Asante left in 1981 when he could not produce a state license the hospital began requiring that year.

The National Institutes of Health then hired Asante as a $30,000-a-year fellow. Again, he was released for lack of a license. Walson Army Hospital in Fort Dix. N.J., then hired Asante as a staff anesthesiologist and he was involved in about 70 operations. According to court papers, when he administered anesthesia to Joseph Branda, Branda's heart stopped, Asante failed to notice for four minutes, and the patient went into a coma. Officials rechecked Asante's credentials and reported him to the FBI. Asante is serving a 12-year term in Otisville Federal Prison for aggravated assault in the Branda case.●

RESOLUTION BY THE PRESIDENT'S COMMITTEE ON MENTAL RETARDATION

● Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I would like to call the attention of my colleagues to an important resolution recently adopted unanimously by the President's Committee on Mental Retardation [PCMR]. This resolution reaffirms the fundamental right of mentally retarded persons to live in the community.

The Supreme Court will shortly consider the Cleburne case where a local zoning ordinance has excluded mentally retarded persons from living in the community, unless a special zoning permit is issued. The Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals has correctly upheld the right of mentally retarded persons to reside in the community. It is incumbent upon the Supreme Court to do the same.

While I commend PCMR for demonstrating the courage of their convictions in working toward securing and maintaining the inalienable rights of mentally retarded persons, I am once again disheartened by the action taken by the U.S. Department of Justice. Rather than leading the march for the rights of America's handicapped citizens, it has positioned itself as an obstacle in that march. By filing an amicus brief supporting the reversal of the court of appeals decision, the Department of Justice has placed one more hurdle in the road to independence for America's retarded citizens.

I urge my colleagues to carefully review the President's Committee on Mental Retardation resolution, and I ask that this resolution be printed in today's RECORD at the conclusion of these remarks.

The resolution follows:

PCMR RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE CLEBURNE CASE

Whereas mentally retarded persons have historically been subjected to State imposed exclusion from education, employment and housing and denied the opportunity to participate fully in American community life; and

Whereas systematic State imposed exclusion and hostile differential treatment continues to prevent mentally retarded persons from full enjoyment of the rights and opportunities guaranteed to other citizens such as the right to associate actively within the social and economic fabric of families, neighborhoods, and communities, unrestricted by prejudice or stereotype; and

Whereas the zoning ordinance passed by the City of Cleburne, Texas, in 1947, excluding except by special use permit from apartment districts and other areas of the city where congregated living is permitted, "feeble minded" persons, is an integral part of this type of systematic State exclusion of and hostile treatment towards mentally retarded citizens; and

Whereas the President's Committee on Mental Retardation has consistently supported all efforts to combat and overcome the effects of State imposed exclusion and hostility toward mentally retarded Americans and to establish the right of mentally retarded persons to choose their living arrangements; and

Whereas Group Homes currently are the principal community living alternatives for persons who are mentally retarded and the availability of such a home in communities is an essential ingredient of normal living patterns for mentally retarded persons; and

Whereas the President's Committee on Mental Retardation has long recognized that mentally retarded citizens lack sufficient political power to effectively access or use the political and legislative process to asset and to protect their basic rights; and

Whereas the President's Committee on Mental Retardation has vigorously supported both legislative and judicial action to ensure Equal Protection under the laws of state and localities; and

Whereas the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals has struck down the Cleburne Ordinance as contrary to the Equal Protection guarantees of the Fourteenth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution; and

Whereas the Supreme Court of the United States now has before it a challenge to the validity of this zoning ordinance under the Equal Protection Clause;

Now therefore be it resolved that: The President's Committee on Mental Retardation express its view that the application of the Cleburne Ordinance to Americans with Mental Retardation represents a type of unlawful invidious discrimination existing across the Nation which is barred by the U.S. Constitution.●

THE NEW CORPORATE ELITE

● Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, on January 21, 1985, the editors of Business Week highlighted a group of industrialists they dubbed "The New Corporate Elite." On that list is Donald C. Burr, a resident of Somerset County, NJ. Donald C. Burr is the founder, chairman, and president of People Express Airlines. According to Business Week, he ranks among the top of America's corporate officials. In New Jersey, we are proud of him.

On January 7, 1985, Time singled out Don as one of seven unique individuals who succeeded—through innovation, boldness, and resolve—to conquer significant challenges in meeting goals. Don Burr certainly fits that description, for he has taken an idea, providing low-cost air fares and no-frills service, and turned it into one of America's thriving companies.

Since the time of Thomas Edison, New Jersey has been noted for innovation and invention. Don Burr and People Express fit squarely into that heritage. Recently, People Express moved into a new terminal at Newark Airport. This was a significant event for the growth of the airport, the airline itself, and the surrounding community. People Express has made a major contribution to New Jersey's economy and growth.

On December 23, 1984, the New York Times Magazine carried a lengthy article on the history, organization, and development of People Express. I commend these articles to my colleagues and ask that they be printed in the RECORD.

The articles follow:

DONALD BURR: THE PERFECTION IMPERATIVE

The problem: Could dependable air travel be maintained while prices were severely cut by abolishing all frills? More important, could the basic structure of the U.S. corporation be changed so that everyone is an owner, everyone a manager?

Sure, says Donald Burr, 43, founder and chairman of People Express, who has done both. Four years ago, when People Express became one of the first new carriers to go into business after the Airline Deregulation Act of 1978, Burr's fledgling venture consisted of little more than one abandoned, rat-infested terminal in Newark and three used Boeing 737s purchased from Lufthansa. Today, People Express is the tenth busiest airline in the U.S., carrying nearly 1 million passengers a month. Some of its fares are one-fourth those of its competitors, but its profits for 1984 will total $23.5 million.

Part of Burr's success has been his policy of cutting amenities: passengers must pay for any checked luggage, even for a cup of coffee (50¢). As a result, he has kept costs down to a little over 5¢ a seat-mile, vs. an industry average of 8.5¢. One key way of keeping those costs down is that Burr hires only "managers" (even a flight attendant is a "customer-service manager"), and all 4,000 full-time employees must move around in several different kinds of jobs. Burr occasionally takes his turn as a steward. Not only are the managers nonunion but each of them must buy at least 100 shares of People Express stock, on credit if necessary.

"This is not some old company refurbishing itself, it's a brand-new idea in brand-new clothes," says Burr. "This is not a social experiment. It's a hard-driving capitalist business. We want to maximize profits, and we want to do very well at that. But we can find a better way to do it, a way that is more friendly and more conducive to people getting out of life what the hell they're trying to get out of it. You don't just want to make a buck. You want people to become better people."

If Burr sounds like a combination of a choirmaster's son and a Harvard M.B.A., it is because he is both. His mother, who lives near Hartford, remembers him as "a very emotional boy with great faith." His older brother, an Air Force colonel, says their father's rule was: "There's nothing you cannot do, no task is impossible." Since boyhood, Burr has been interested in aviation; he became a Wall Street analyst of aviation stocks before he was 30, rescued and took over a nosediving airline, Texas International, before he was 36.

Burr believes strongly in what he calls the perfection imperative, the desire to be better. He stopped smoking a year and a half ago; he trains for the marathon every morning; on his upcoming ski trip to Utah, his first extended vacation in five years, he plans to reflect on "life-style improvement to improve my efficiency."

Other corporations fail to follow Burr's lead, he says, because "they think humankind is lazy and bestial and won't do anything unless you beat them to death., We live with a 'boss' structure. But we've proved that if you give people space, room and freedom, you can get trustworthy behavior."

THE AIRLINE THAT SHOOK THE INDUSTRY

(By Sara Rimer)

It is Friday night at Newark International airport, any Friday night, rush hour in the round-the-clock mecca of the discount air traveler.

At the North Terminal, the silver buses roll in one after the other, standing room only, from Manhattan. Burdened with suitcases, briefcases, backpacks and shopping bags stuffed with food for the no-frills journey, the travelers join the throngs of people already hurrying to the 21 gates along the terminal's two long and narrow wings.

Lines form everywhere, for a hot dog, for the bathrooms, for a standby seat on any People Express plane that leaves for Boston between 7 and 11 P.M., when tickets go for $19. At some gates, people sit on the carpet, awash in luggage. College students study textbooks, men and women in business garb scrawl notes across legal tablets, crying babies get fed.

"I've got a headache," groans Lorri Turano, a 19-year-old data processor from Nutley, N.J., lighting a cigarette as she collapses in a chair near the Washington gate.

"It's a zoo out here," says Heather Fitzenhagen, a marketing representative for a Manhattan computer consulting firm. "It's nutso!" She's on her way to Syracuse for the weekend.

Lorri Turano and Heather Fitzenhagen and thousands of others are crowded inside a building that was, just 40 months ago, a near-ghost town of a terminal with a single scheduled flight a day. They are going to Chicago, Miami, Denver, Washington—a total of 27 cities across America—for less than $100. Over in more spacious quarters at Terminal C, they are on their way to London and the West Coast.

All this is something new, spawned by Federal deregulation of the airtransport industry. Dozens of fledgling airlines have emerged, transforming America's travel habits, their low-cost flights luring people away from cars, buses and trains and from out of their living rooms. But none of the new operations has had anything like the impact or the success of People Express and its fast-talking, 43-year-old founder and chief executive, Donald Calvin Burr. In 1980, for example, 540,000 passengers flew the Newark-to-Boston route; since then, that figure has almost tripled, with People Express accounting for the lion's share of the difference.

"I think Don Burr is a public benefactor," says Alfred E. Kahn, a former chairman of the Civil Aeronautics Board. "People are flying who have never flown before in their lives." Of course, Burr has not hurt his own cause, either.

People Express has gone from an upstart with 250 employees and three planes in the spring of 1981 to a company with a half-billion dollars in assets, 4,000 full-time employees and more than 60 planes. That's the fastest growth in aviation history. And the airline is still growing, fueled by one of the lowest operating costs in the industry. Counting new planes scheduled for delivery, the airline will have 73 aircraft in use by May. By May 1986, Burr hopes to be serving about 10 additional cities.

Just as remarkable as People Express's success is the way it was achieved. Burr leads a company without traditional supervisors, without secretaries, without organizational charts. The workers, who belong to no union, are expected to perform a variety of jobs—it's known as cross-utilization. They all hold stock and share in company profits. The glue is Burr himself, who dashes about preaching his horizontal-management style with messianic zeal.

Burr's ideas are taken seriously by the likes of the Harvard University Graduate School of Business Administration, where People Express is one of the case studies offered as an example of an advanced management model. Says D. Daryl Wyckoff, a professor of transportation there: "Anyone who isn't studying People Express and the way they're managing people is out of their minds."

Yet Wyckoff and other observers have some doubts about the company's future. Will Burr's unorthodox management style work as the airline grows ever larger? There have been some morale problems, and the company structure is being overhauled. Can People Express continue to challenge the established giants of the airline world? The major carriers are getting tough, streamlining their operations and even cutting their fares to hold on to passengers on well-traveled routes. On Wall Street, security analysts are nervous about the volatile industry—there have been several bankruptcies among the upstart airlines, and their stock prices have been tumbling. Since July 1983, even People Express's stock has fallen—from a high of 25½ to less than 10.

Almost three years ago, another airline that had experienced explosive growth collapsed. Is Don Burr going to be another Sir Freddie Laker? "He's already gone further than Laker ever dreamed of," says Michael R. Armellino, of Goldman, Sachs & Company. "I seriously doubt he's going to be another Laker. But who the hell knows? What's the economy going to do? What are fuel prices going to do? I think the book is still open as to how this is all going to come out in the end."

"The Party's on the 7 o'clock!" shouted Thomas P. Haskins, a 23-year-old sales representative for the Xerox Corporation, loosening his tie. He and four of his buddies were on their way to Holy Cross College in Worcester, Mass.—their alma mater—for the big football game against Boston College.

It was Friday night at the Boston gate. Haskins was among the more than 100 standbys who waited anxiously, hoping to be called before the last plane took off. His friends had reservations. But everyone would buy tickets aboard the plane—one of a long list of People Express's cost-cutting strategies. The cost of their round-trip: $38. (I'll spill more than $38 worth of beer this weekend," Haskins said.) They also paid $3 for each piece of baggage they checked.

People Express has elements of an aerial "Love Boat," the cut-rate answer to long-distance relationships. In the crowd was Michael Todaro, a 23-year-old banking examiner for the Federal Reserve, who lives in Hoboken and flies up to visit his girlfriend. From Churchville, Pa., were William and Lucille Hartnett, who were on their way to Boston for a friend's surprise 60th birthday party. "We wouldn't be going if it weren't so cheap," said the Hartnetts.

At 6:40 P.M., the passengers on Flight 296 began boarding the Boeing 737-200 with the purple, red and orange stripes. There are no assigned seats on most People Express flights, and Tom Haskins led the Holy Cross rush across the tarmac and up the outdoor stairs. The plane had 130 seats, 10 more than can be found in most 737-200's—a trick made possible by removing a galley (there is no hot-meal service) and by reconfiguring the first-class section seating. Except on 747's, the airline has no first class. (We're not a doily service," says Don Burr. "If you want a daily, go fly Swissair.")

The passengers seem a hearty breed, prepared for tight seating and unconcerned about such things as having to pay 50 cents for a cup of coffee. "I could take anything for the price," said Arthur P. Ciacchella, a fourth-year medical student at the University of Pittsburgh.

Not everyone, though, takes the inconveniences of upstart airlines in stride. Complaints come pouring into the C.A.B. For some of the new airlines, the complaints go as high as 20 and 30 per 100,000 passengers—and as low as one or two complaints, figures that match the record of such established lines as American and Eastern. For People Express, it was 4.7 complaints per 100,000 last year; for the first eight months this year, the figure has fallen to 3.8. One problem: flight delays. People Express' on-time record was only 55 percent last winter, though in recent months it has reached a respectable 84 percent. Another problem: Trying to make reservations by telephone.

On Boston Flight 296, the men in the cockpit were Capt. Scott Wankel and First Officer Ron Toler. At People Express, the pilots are known as flight managers. In the aisles were the flight attendants—known as customer service managers, or CSM's.

The duties of CSM's are not confined to the aisles of planes. They check in passengers and meet planes and also are expected to work in one or more other areas such as accounting or aircraft scheduling, wherever their curiosity takes them. What's more, they are part of a system Burr calls "self-management" that gives all employees unusual decision-making opportunities.

Here come the CSM's. Pushing their metal beverage and money carts down the aisle, they sold tickets, drinks and snacks in record time. And they did it with all the smiles and high energy of a freshman cheerleader at a home-coming game.

The 737 landed at Logan International Airport a couple minutes after 8, on time. Liebe Coolidge, who was returning to Boston after a week in Los Angeles, retrieved her artist's portfolio from the overhead rack and bid the CSM's a fond goodbye. "They're a scream," she said.

For some men, it happens during the first handshake with a Joe DiMaggio, but Don Burr's dreams of what he might become grew out of a meeting during his junior year at Stanford University with two stars from another galaxy: an investment banker named W. Peter Slusser, and Keith Funston, the tall patrician who was chief of the New York Stock Exchange.

"They were two impressive guys," Burr recalled one evening in his office overlooking the runway at North Terminal. He had just returned from a ski trip with his wife, Brigit, and two of their four children. The office is modest by corporate standards—the furniture includes a few airline seats—and Burr is disarmingly informal. He was sipping coffee from a Styrofoam cup, which he had filled at the communal coffeepot down the hall. He was laughing a lot and talking fast, answering his own telephone—he has no secretary.

"Keith was Rock Hudson and all those other guys mixed into one," Burr said. "He was a big-time guy." Funston and Slusser advised the young English major, who was thinking about law school, to head for Harvard Business School—their alma mater.

The world of high finance seemed far removed from the small Connecticut town of South Windsor where Don Burr grew up, the son of an electrical engineer; his mother was the town's assistant postmaster. He and his older brother, Myron, who became an Air Force colonel, found excitement at the local airport, watching the planes come and go. Don dated Brigit Rupner, a blonde, blue-eyed cheerleader; they married when they were 20.

Burr sang in the Congregational church choir, which was directed by his father. His mother ran the Sunday school. "I was the leader of the youth group," he said. "I went out proselytizing. They picked me out in church to go to seminary." His family had other plans. "My mother wanted me to be a doctor or a lawyer—one of the high-prestige positions," he recalled. "From my family's point of view, business didn't have any redeeming value."

But Burr changed his major at Stanford from English to economics after that brief meeting with Funston and Slusser—he also earned a private pilot's license on the side—and he did go on to Harvard Business School. After Harvard, he spent eight years on Wall Street with the National Aviation Corporation, a small securities firm. By the time he was 30, he was president.

In 1973, Burr went to work for Frank Lorenzo, the chief executive of Texas International Airlines, a floundering regional carrier based in Houston. The two men were of an age, fellow Harvard M.B.A.'s, with matching competitive urges. By 1978, with Burr as chief operating officer, the airline had become profitable—partly because it was among the first to offer low-cost, off-peak fares.

The next year, Burr was made president of Texas International, but he resigned six months later. The reason, Burr now claims, was a deep, longstanding dissatisfaction with the company. "It was grind, grind, grind, with no better purpose than to grind out some profits," he said. "It had no vision, no excitement." (Lorenzo refused to be interviewed on the subject of Don Burr, but through a spokesman he offered a comment on Burr's description of Texas International: "Those statements simply aren't true. Don was part of the hierarchy at T.I., and he never expressed those feelings to me.")

Many in the airline business view the relationship between Lorenzo and Burr with mystified fascination. Burr was best man at Lorenzo's wedding and is godfather to one of Lorenzo's children. Yet, according to a former executive at Texas International, "They were at war the whole time. It's a love-hate relationship."

Today, the competition goes on. Lorenzo runs Texas Air Corporation, a holding company that operates two low-fare operations, New York Air and Continental Airlines, both of which go head-to-head with People Express on several routes. When Don Burr was reminded that Lorenzo, like Burr, runs marathons, he interrupted. "I got Frank started running," he said.

People Express was born at the start of a new era. Before deregulation began in 1978, the Federal Government controlled routes and fares, providing a kind of safety net for the airlines. While Burr might have seemed like a rookie playing in the big leagues of the airline world, many authorities felt the big leagues weren't all they were cracked up to be, that those at the helm had become inefficient and uninspired. Sam Coats, president of Muse Air, describes them as "the most mediocre group of managers in American industry." Deregulation freed airlines to set their own routes and fare structures and plunged them into the real world of competition.

Burr had nothing like enough money to compete, and he went to William Hambrecht, of the San Francisco venture capital firm of Hambrecht & Quist, for help. It was a hard sell; financial analysts derided the idea of a new airline at Newark airport.

"It was a double cab fare to Newark from Manhattan at the time," Hambrecht recalled. "They were convinced Newark couldn't work." That cab fare has since been reduced to the meter plus $10 and tolls, but People's customers don't generally rely on cabs. They're more likely to pay $4 a person to ride the New Jersey Transit express buses that leave every 15 minutes, 24 hours a day, from the Port Authority Bus Terminal. Five years ago, before People Express, 375,000 people made the trip; last year, the figure was more than 1.5 million.

Why couldn't the Wall Street experts see what was coming? "Most financial analysts," Hambrecht said, "don't take the bus."

The timing of the People Express start-up was ideal. For one thing, though Wall Street was nervous about the project, investment funds in general were in good supply. So were cheap aircraft. Burr was able to pick up Boeing 737's from Lufthansa, the German airline, for $3.7 million apiece, a fraction of what they would have cost new. And he could choose from a large pool of workers who had been laid off by other airlines and were willing to accept lower, nonunion wages from People Express.

Service began in April 1981, with three planes making short-haul round trips between Newark and some smaller cities, steering clear of routes blanketed by the major airlines and offering discounts of 40 to 60 percent. Burr also adopted an important costcutting tactic. He used outside contractors instead of employees to handle some of the basic work of the airline, including aircraft maintenance, baggage handling and ramp maintenance.

Three months after start-up, disaster loomed in the form of the air-traffic controllers' strike. People's departures from Newark had to be cut back, reducing revenues at the very moment when Burr had to accept delivery of more planes from Lufthansa or lose the $6 million deposit.

"Everything fell apart," Burr says. "We began to lose money at a terrific rate—$3 million a month." Burr went to Washington to ask the Federal Aviation Administration for help. "They basically said, 'Tough, we didn't tell you to buy those planes. Sell your planes. You're on your own, sweetheart.' "

Gerald L. Gitner, one of the 10 Texas International managers Burr corralled and a founding partner and president of People, created an unorthodox strategy. The planes would be flown out of Newark at dawn—before the Government restrictions on the numbers of flights went into effect—to cities such as Buffalo and Syracuse. Picking up low-fare passengers there, they would fly on to such Florida cities as Jacksonville and Sarasota. The plan kept People afloat until the Government restrictions were eased.

When Burr sought more capital with a second sale of stock in August 1982, Wall Street knew People Express was really on its way. Joining with Hambrecht & Quist in the public offering was the blue-chip investment firm of Morgan Stanley & Company.

Have you ever heard a person say, "I'm not going to fall in love?" Don Burr asked. He paced back and forth in front of a class of 50 new People Express recruits, a handsome trim executive in a Paul Stuart suit. "It's risky business, falling in love. You might fall out of love. Someone might not like you. We're trying to find a way for you to welcome commitment at People Express. It's a hell of a lot more fun to be committed and involved than sitting on the sidelines."

Burr never misses an indoctrination session. He cracks jokes. He preaches, sometimes taking "Star Wars," his favorite film, as his text for a sermon on the forces of good and evil in the business world. And he inevitably ends with his own vision of People Express: The Good Company.

"You're not a commodity," he told the recruits. "The minute you think you're a commodity you'll end up an undifferentiated mass—bubble gum on the streets. You're not a beaten-down worker. You're a manager. You're an owner."

With questions and answers and time for a break, the session lasted two hours. Burr was awarded a resounding ovation. John McGrail, a former Coast Guard pilot from Pensacola, Fla., practically floated out of the room. "I think the man's a wizard," he said. "This is the opportunity I've been waiting for all my life. This is my road to self-actualization."

Why are so many Americans unhappy at their jobs? According to Michael Maccoby, author of "The Gamesman" and the director of the nonprofit Project on Technology, Work and Character in Washington, it is not so much the work itself. "What people don't like," he says, "is the way they're treated, the lack of respect by supervisors, the lack of information about what the hell is going on, the lack of people asking their view, the lack of fairness."

In most corporations, the mass of workers, those who actually manufacture products and deal directly with customers, have so-called line jobs. The people who have little or no direct contact with products or customers—the executives and those in such departments as accounting or marketing—hold so-called staff jobs. Important decisions are made at the top, and trickle down through layers of management to the lower ranks.

Airlines have, by and large, followed this traditional vertical approach. "What an airline is, from an operational standpoint, is a coordination job," says Michael E. Levine, a former general director of the Civil Aeronautics Board and former head of New York Air. "It takes a lot of coordination to dispatch 100 flights a day on some rough approximation of a timetable. The conventional wisdom in the business has been that you have to really stay on top of that in a very structured way."

People Express is different. It operates on the theory that people will work harder and have a better time at it if they are given four things:

A financial stake in the company. The employees of People Express hold a third of all the outstanding shares of company stock, and they also share in company profits. Every new recruit is required to purchase at least 100 discounted shares of stock. Some workers, like Tom Kohl, former music director at a church in Cleveland, are serious collectors. He has 5,800 shares after three and a half years and proclaims with assurance: "I expect to be a millionaire by my 10th anniversary." (Don Burr holds 1.35 million shares; profit-sharing plus a $68,000 salary brought his total earnings last year to $108,000.)

A chance to learn and hold a variety of jobs. Before he came to People Express 4 years ago, Roger Hill, 36, had spent most of his adult working life in the cockpit of an airplane. "All I knew about the airline business was what I read," Hill says. At People Express, he become a 737 captain, but he also had a chance to learn aircraft scheduling and to become what passes for a boss at People Express. Employees are organized in teams of three or four people, units that tend to move about from job to job; the personal relationships within a team are thought to make the work more fun and to increase efficiency. As one among 150 team managers, Hill functions as a kind of playing coach. While pursuing his own scheduling assignment, he guides and encourages his teams.

Four years ago, Hill was a pilot, period. Now, he says, "I can go out and do anything that needs to be done to get that airplane airborne on time."

An organizational structure that allows workers to make large and small decisions based upon a company philosophy and tradition. When People Express decided to start service between Newark and Gatwick Airport outside London, 12 employees were dispatched to Gatwick to set up the operation. CSM Mike Brown, a 28-year-old, one-time social worker and a three-year People Express veteran, was a member of the team. He helped decide which vendors would be hired, what bank would be used, how the check-in facility would be laid out. Says Brown: "Setting up an international station for People Express! I was part of a team that pulled that off!"

There are limits on employees' decision-making powers. "Obviously," says Burr, "the pilots don't sit up there and decide whether they're going to land or not. You have to maintain schedules."

A sense of belonging—not just to a company, but to a family. Unmarried employees share apartments and houses. They party together, they introduce each other to friends and families. Romance is rife. "We work together, we play together," says Carl Comasco, a 24-year-old CSM who is engaged to another CSM, 25-year-old Cheri Cueroni. They met while working the same flight.

And in this family, mom and dad wash the dishes. Officers of the company can be found on flights, serving drinks and selling tickets alongside CSM's, and on the ground, checking in passengers or handling an occasional bag. Pilot James Morris remembers seeing Harold J. Pareti, who became the airline's president this summer, move in on a long, slow-moving line of passengers waiting to go to Washington and start fastening name tags to bags. "I was so embarrassed," Morris says, "I started to help, too."

To tie the disparate pieces of the company together, Burr has created an elaborate communications system. The goal is to make sure that everyone knows what's going on in the company and to give everyone a chance to have his or her say. According to Leonard A. Schlesinger, a Harvard professor and author of the People Express case study at the business school: "The level of commitment to the dissemination of information—and the amount of it—is virtually unprecedented for a company of its size."

Dozens of color television sets are scattered around the general offices, in training classrooms, and in lounges so that employees can tune in the company's daily, 15-minute news show. Workers themselves produce and star in the show, which is created each night and provides information about the company and its competitors.

Burr takes the pulse of his workers each year with a survey in which they are asked to give anonymous answers to such questions as: Do you respect the leadership? Are you satisfied with the compensation program? Should we have an employee cafeteria? And once a month, Burr and the other officers of the company conduct question-and-answer sessions for employees. At a recent session, which lasted more than 3 hours, there were probing questions about everything from finances to future plans.

Beyond such formal programs, the company encourages employees to keep in touch with each other and to give credit where due. The hallways at company headquarters are papered with handwritten notes Scotch taped to the walls. Revenue Accounting, for example, had praise for Jeff Plain "who came in today on his day off to give us a hand."

The People Express philosophy yields corporate benefits. "It's definitely a work-ethic company," says Jim Miller, a 28-year-old team manager. Theoretically, employees work 40-hour weeks, but Miller and many others put in hours of extra time—without additional pay. "I'm here all the time," he says. "It's because I want to be."

Yet there have been occasional dissatisfactions. Pilots see themselves as an elite, highly skilled profession. When People Express began, as a symbol of its democratic ways, the airline left off the traditional wings and stripes from the uniforms of its pilots. They felt "belittled," says a 32-year-old captain. "A lot of them were concerned the passengers couldn't tell them from the flight attendants." Eighteen months ago, the company yielded and the wings and stripes materialized.

Some pilots also complain about money. Flight managers' salaries start at $22,000 and can rise as high as $56,250, not counting profit sharing. Though such figures are more or less in line with salaries at other upstart airlines, they don't begin to match the pay of captains at the established airlines. On average, captains who belong to the Air Line Pilots Association earn about $103,000 a year.

On the other hand, People Express offered pilots work at a time when jobs were scarce. Many pilots, who would otherwise have had to wait years, quickly became captains. The pilots' association has twice appealed for the flight managers' support for a union election at People Express, and twice been overwhelmingly rebuffed. A third effort is underway.

Last year, Burr says, he sensed a widespread problem with employee morale. The company was growing by leaps and bounds, and many employees were feeling lost. "You can smell it," he says. "All you've got to do is walk down the hallway. People don't look right." His diagnosis: "We had outgrown our structure."

After months of discussion and meetings throughout the company, People Express began remodeling that structure. Employees were divided into 10 operational groups, with 200 to 300 people in each. The groups are committed to different aircraft, functioning like miniairlines within the big airline. So far, there are three 737 groups, six 727 groups, and one 747 group.

Within the new structure, though, Burr will go on preaching his unorthodox management approach—and many observers will go on debating whether it could work so well without him. "It takes almost a messiah," William Hambrecht says. "That's the glue that holds it together."

Burr himself insists that People Express is not a one-man show. He points to the increasing role of Harold Pareti, who has, for example, taken over from Burr as the leader of the daily operational meeting.

"My role is reducing," Burr says. But he makes it clear that he is still in charge: "It's very much a Don Burr place."

The company's growth continues to be phenomenal. Industry analysts predict that total operating revenues for 1984 will be $613 million, up from $287 million in 1983. This year's profits will be close to the $10 million figure for 1983; the company is the only new airline that is earning a significant profit, and it is being plowed back to keep the airline expanding.

But Wall Street is nervous about the upstart airlines. Some have gone bankrupt. And during the last year, the established airlines have begun to fight back. Some have negotiated two-tier labor contracts that pay new employees dramatically lower wages. And they have started to match the new carriers' fares on some routes, though usually with restrictions such as advance booking. American, Eastern, and United, for example, have been meeting People Express' low fares to Florida, the Middle West, and the West Coast.

But Don Burr remains ever the optimist. One night last fall, he was driving back to the airport in his BMW after an orientation session. It had been a long day, starting with a 7-mile run in the early morning near his home in bucolic Somerset County, N.J. For a moment, he let his fatigue show. Then another question was posed, and suddenly the evangelical fervor was back in his voice. No, he wasn't worried that People Express was expanding too fast. "It's our No. 1 precept," he said.

Within the next two years, People Express will be leaving its cramped headquarters at the North Terminal in Newark and moving into a glamorous, refurbished Terminal C, complete with atrium, waterfall—and 44 gates, nearly double the current number. The airline will be flying to new cities, on the West Coast, in the South, in the Northeast. As the BMW approached North Terminal, threading a path among buses and scurrying passengers, Don Burr began to dream about even more distant frontiers. Hawaii? Japan? "Who knows?" he said. "Maybe we'll be going to the moon in 50 years—as a regular deal!"●

EXTENSION OF GENERAL REVENUE SHARING

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today as an original cosponsor of legislation, S. 318, introduced by the senior Senator from Pennsylvania, Senator HEINZ, to reauthorize and extend the General Revenue Sharing Program for another 5 years through 1991.

The General Revenue Sharing Program matches the best talents of the Federal Government with the best talents of local government. The Federal Government is effective at raising money, but spends it inefficiently. Local government spends money more effectively, but has difficulty raising funds. The General Revenue Sharing Program has the Federal Government extend funds to local government based on a formula of need with no strings attached. Local governments they are free to spend the money on the programs they deem most important.

The General Revenue Sharing Program was the initial brainchild of our last majority leader, Senator Howard Baker. Senator Baker felt, rightly, that Federal funds should be given to local governments with as little direct Federal supervision as possible. The rationale for this was that the Federal Government cannot possibly know what is best for a specific project in New York and Tennessee. It should be left to the local experts to decide what projects should be undertaken.

Since Senator Baker promulgated the revenue sharing concept, the program has proven to be quite effective. General revenue sharing is now due to expire on December 31, 1986. I strongly believe that it is not too early to begin considering an extension of the program. Only in this way can local governments begin making future budget plans with any degree of accuracy and certainty.

I urge my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to support S. 318, an extension and reauthorization of the General Revenue Sharing Program through 1991.●

MORRIS "MO" SCHIFFMAN

● Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I would like to take a moment to pay tribute to Morris "Mo" Schiffman, one of Florida's most endeared and dedicated citizens. Mo Schiffman was 84 at the time of his recent death. During the 20 years he lived in Miami Beach, he was constantly active in community service. He served as president of Miami Beach Tenants' Association, was vigorously involved in the Committee for Better Government for Miami Beach, served as a Silver Haired Legislator for the State of Florida, and was former vice president of the Congress of Senior Citizens. Mo Schiffman was a respected fighter for the interests of the elderly, and at the time of his death was president of the Miami Beach Retirees. I am sure that the Members of this body join me in expressing sympathy for Mo's wife Beatrice and his family. He will be noticeably and sincerely missed by many of us in Florida.●

THE NOMINATION OF JAMES BAKER

● Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I am pleased to vote for James Baker to be our next Secretary of the Treasury. Mr. Baker won the unanimous support of the finance committee, and he is sure to gain our near unanimous support here today.

As President Reagan's chief of staff, Mr. Baker has made significant contributions to this administration, the country, and all Americans. As Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Baker will continue to keep the country's best interest at hand.

I am especially pleased to support a new secretary who will continue the Treasury's work toward tax reform. With Mr. Baker at the helm, the future of tax reform—whether it's the Reagan bill, Kemp-Kasten, Bradley-Gephardt, or some modified version of all three—is secure. And, with Secretary Regan as chief of staff, the prospect of tax reform is even more definite.

Mr. Baker shares my concern that the tax system is neither fair nor simple. It is about time the American people got a break from the maze of tax laws, regulations, and interpretations of those laws and regulations. And, we believe that tax reform is just the way to do it.

Mr. Baker also believes—as do I—that tax reform should not be an excuse for a tax increase. We both know that tax increases have been tried as part of our efforts to get the deficits under control. We both have found that while the tax increases have come through, the spending reductions have not. And, the deficits have gotten bigger, not smaller.

President Reagan has outlined a full agenda for the next 4 years that includes tax reform and deficit reduction through spending restaint. I believe that Mr. Baker will be a strong supporter of the President's policies, and that he will do everything possible to put them in place.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to lend their support to Mr. Baker.

IMPORTS FROM THE U.S.S.R. MADE BY FORCED LABOR

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, in November 1983, the Senate Finance Committee agreed to my proposal to instruct the International Trade Commission to provide Congress with a comprehensive report, drawing together all information available to the U.S. Government, on the nature and extent of U.S. imports from state trading nations, such as the U.S.S.R., manufactured by forced labor. Last month the ITC released its reports.

I requested this study in the face of the administration's apparent unwillingness to enforce existing law prohibiting the importation of goods made by forced labor.

Section 307 of the Smoot Hawley Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, prohibits the importation of goods from "any foreign country" made "wholly or in part" by convict, forced, or indentured labor. The regulations currently governing implementation of section 307 provide that if the Commissioner of Customs has information "that reasonably but not conclusively indicates that merchandise within the purview of section 307 is being, or is likely to be, imported," such merchandise will not be permitted to enter our country until a final determination is made. That final determination requires the approval of the Secretary of Treasury. Once merchandise is detained, the burden falls, as it should, on the importer to show that the goods were not made, in part or in whole, by forced labor.

There can and should be no doubt about the extent of forced labor in the Soviet Union. As Undersecretary for Political Affairs, Lawrence Eagleburger reported almost 2 years ago:

> Forced labor in the Soviet Union is a long-standing and grave human rights issue. The Soviet forced labor system, the largest in the world, comprises a network of some 1,100 forced labor camps, which cover most areas of the USSR. The system includes an estimated four million forced laborers, of whom at least 10,000 are considered to be political and religious prisoners.

During the spring and summer of 1983, Senator ARMSTRONG and others brought to the administration's attention the fact that many goods produced by these forced laborers were being imported into the United States. They relied on a list supplied by the CIA of the industries and products in which forced labor is used extensively, as well as on information supplied by the Customs Service regarding the level and kinds of imports from the Soviet Union. These products included camera lenses, wood cabinets, mattresses, steel drums, cathode ray tube components, electrical motors, clothing, bauxite, gold ore, manganese, and limestone. The Commissioner of Customs, William von Raab, was persuaded. However, rather than proceed to enforce section 307—as is in his authority to do—he wrote to Secretary of the Treasury Regan, who apparently was unpersuaded. Secretary Regan consigned the issue to an interagency group for further study.

There the issue remained, despite overwhelming congressional sentiment that section 307 be enforced. In November 1983, the Senate adopted a resolution calling on the administration to use section 307 to bar the import of goods from the U.S.S.R. unless they were produced without forced labor, and the House passed a resolution condemning the use of forced labor in the Soviet Union.

Still the administration refused to listen. Treasury developed the argument—contrary to the plain terms of the statute and the regulations currently in force—that Customs could not proceed without specific and detailed information regarding each particular product. Yet, the CIA reported that it could not provide such information without compromising intellifence sources and methods. A new application of Joseph Heller's "Catch 22," and another case of nonenforcement of a statute.

Given the current situation, Mr. President, the report by the International Trade Commission is especially important in two respects.

First, the ITC report assembles and reviews estimates made by others about the extent of forced labor imports from the Soviet Union. The report reviews the estimate made by the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe [the Helsinki Commission], that the value of U.S. imports from the U.S.S.R. produced by Soviet industries which, in part, use compulsory labor, totaled $138 million in 1982—of total imports from the U.S.S.R. of $228 million. The report also examines why that estimate may be somewhat overestimated and reports later estimates, previously unpublished, by the Commerce Department and the Customs Service during the interagency deliberations. Commerce estimated that forced labor imports from the Soviet Union totaled about some $28 million in 1982, or about 10 percent of all U.S. imports from the U.S.S.R. that year. Customs, backing away from its earlier estimate, now says that forced labor imports totaled only $11 million in 1982. With respect to this lower Customs estimate, the ITC notes that at least some information exists that forced labor was used to produce other items as well imported into the United States.

Second, the ITC's report demonstrates the wisdom of the approach of current regulations, placing the burden on the importer to show that particular goods were not made by forced labor. The ITC expresses frustration, understandable to this Senator, at its inability to verify the role of forced labor, in the manufacture of particular imports, the productivity of forced labor and the types of goods they produce. We cannot be surprised at the Soviet's reluctance to permit an inspection tour. Yet, this lack of verification must not impede our administration of the statute, because we do have reasonable information suggesting which imports have been made with forced labor. If that is not the case, those who do have information rebutting the charge can come forth.

Mr. President, the use of forced labor transcends concerns with trade: It is a grave violation of human rights. We should not encourage or countenance this monstrous practice by importing any goods made with such labor. The Commissioner of Customs and the Secretary of the Treasury have information that reasonably, even if not conclusively, indicates that we are importing forced labor goods from the Soviet Union. They should proceed expeditiously to do what should have been done all along: Prevent suspect goods from entering our country unless and until the importer can demonstrate that they were not made by forced labor, in whole or in any part.●

PROTECTION OF AMERICANS FROM EXTORTION AND VIOLENCE: REINTRODUCTION OF THE HOBBS ACT BILL

● Mr. EAST. Mr. President, today Senator GRASSLEY has reintroduced his bill to make it clear that Congress intends to punish those who resort to extortion and violence during labor disputes. The bill would clarify the purpose behind 18 U.S.C. 1951, commonly known as the Hobbs Act.

Congress passed the Hobbs Act in 1946 to cover all forms of violence, extortion, and related crime involving interstate commerce. At the time, Congressman Hobbs explained Congress' purpose in passing the Hobbs Act: "crime is crime, no matter who commits it; and that robbery is robbery, and extortion is extortion, whether or not the perpetrator has a union card."

51-059 O-86-8 (Pt. 2)

In 1973 in Enmons v. United States, 410 U.S. 396 (1973), however, the Supreme Court ruled that the Hobbs Act did not cover violence in interstate commerce when "in pursuit of legitimate labor objectives." Until the decision in Enmons, no person or group, whatever its objective, was exempt from the coverage of the Hobbs Act. Any actual or threatened use of violence or force to obtain property was wrongful—resorting to violence was simply not condoned as a means of settling a dispute.

S. 300 would reestablish Congress' original intent under the Hobbs Act, and eliminate the loophole created by the Enmons decision. It would define the crime of extortion as taking another's property by force, no matter what the objective, and it would make union officials subject to prosecution when involved in acts of extortion. At the same time it would make it an affirmative defense that a defendant's conduct was incidental to peaceful picketing and consisted solely of minor bodily injury or minor damage to property.

Let me say here that I firmly believe in the importance of collective bargaining. I believe that we should excuse minor, unavoidable incidents during legitimate strikes, and I do not believe that the Federal Government should be involved in policing normal, every day, labor disputes. I believe just as firmly, however, that a free society presupposes an orderly community and that violence is not a necessary part of labor disputes. In England, labor violence of the sort we have here seldom if ever occurs yet the unions are able to bring whole industries to a standstill. When a labor dispute becomes extremely violent and involves death threats or shootings, Federal jurisdiction is needed. Congress should take action to preserve our freedom from fear.

Last Congress both the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers and the full Committee on the Judiciary held hearings on the Hobbs Act bill. On July 19, 1983, the subcommittee favorably reported the measure to the committee. During these hearings I was appalled to learn of the violent acts that have been committed with impunity because of the Enmons decision.

Since 1975 public records revealed the occurence of over 3,350 separate cases of union inspired violence, violence against both employers and individual workers. Incident after incident involves assault, battery, threats and other forms of violence. Some of it occurs inside the plant, some of it occurs on the picket line, and a good deal of it occurs away from the place of employment, the most terrifying often occurring at the employee's only sanctuary—his home.

During the 1981 United Mine Workers Union strike, sharpshooters and saboteurs ravaged the highways in the coal-producing regions of Kentucky, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and Virginia. Out-gunned, intimidated or financially strained local law enforcement agencies often looked the other way in the face of this well-orchestrated violence. Because of Enmons, sorely pressed States like Virginia which were forced to mobilize hundreds of State troopers to protect life and property on the highways could obtain no Federal help. Often the perpetrators slipped easily across State lines to elude capture by State and local authorities. Kentucky State Police, for instance, acknowledged that out-of-State hit men were responsible for much of the strike havoc wreaked upon their State.

In Oakman, AL, during the violent coal miners' strike of 1977, seven people, including the owners of a small family mining operation were surrounded by miners firing shots and exploding dynamite. Local authorities refused to become involved. Said the sheriff, "Well, there is nothing I can do. I am a union man myself." UMW sharpshooters drove off a State police helicopter and two Army National Guard helicopters. One of the pilots, a Vietnam war veteran, likened the scene to a Vietnam fire fight. The party of seven was finally rescued by a convoy of cars from the State police but the miners—between 1,200 and 1,500 of them—did thousands of dollars worth of damages to the State police cars. No convictions ever arose out of this activity at the State or local level.

In Port Arthur, TX, in 1982, William H. Hinote, who crossed a picket line and returned to work, was subjected to months of violent threats and intimidation culminating in his being ambushed and shot five times. His wife and two children—ages 7 and 12—received a stream of obscene phone calls and were told repeatedly that Hinote was a dead man. Mrs. Hinote's employer received calls threatening to blow up the store if Mrs. Hinote were not discharged.

In Lancaster, PA, on June 8, 1983, Robert Wohlsen, Sr., of Wohlsen Construction Co. was hit on the head by a striker with what appeared to be a rock. He sustained a hemorrhage between the skull and the membrane around the brain that required surgery. Wohlsen had requested that State police be at the strike site. None showed up until after Wohlsen and others in his party had been assaulted, and his camera and video equipment had been destroyed or stolen. Even the subsequent presence of the police did not prevent truck tires from being slashed and hydraulic hoses from being cut.

In Honolulu, HI, Walter Mungovan, his family, and the employees of his construction company were subjected to a program of harassment and intimidation. Picketers carried guns on the picket line. Union members repeatedly contacted the Mungovans and threatened to blow up their home or to kill Mr. Mungovan. They harassed the families of Mungovan's employees and threatened employees of his delivery companies. One night the Mungovan's vehicles were damaged in the amount of $3,000. The word "SCAB" was painted all over them. The police at best were uncooperative; at worst they were openly aiding the picketers. For 3½ months the Mungovan's called the police to their jobsites. They either did not come or showed up late. At the picket site, police officers warned picketers not to talk to Mr. Mungovan because he was carrying a tape recorder. The Mungovan's discovered that, during this period, the police officers failed to file adequate reports about union threats and violence. When confronted with their negligence they replied on one occasion that they were in a union themselves and did not want trouble with another union; another time they admitted that the picketers were friends and relatives of theirs.

On August 5, 1983, in Willamina, OR, strikers threw paint, golf balls, and rocks at those crossing a picket line. One car was badly damaged and another burned 5 feet from a natural gas meter and 10 feet from an elderly woman's window.

In Great Falls, MT, for 10 days beginning on July 22, 1983, a union launched a campaign of violence against supervisory personnel of the Brinderson Corp. Four trucks and three cars were damaged, six people were injured enough to require medical assistance, and two were hospitalized. Neither of the two were connected with the union or Brinderson. One was a civilian Air Force base employee, and another was a member of the general public who had wandered onto the scene. The Governor of the State told Brinderson representatives that State law prevented him from taking any action to prevent such violence. The local sheriff did send men to the picketing site but they were outnumbered by a 20-to-1 ratio.

During the summer of 1983 in Moyie Springs, ID, strikers and union officials threw rocks at employees of Louisiana Pacific Corp., slashed their tires both at home and at work, strewed nails across driveways, fired lug nuts, rocks and ballbearings with wrist rockets, derailed two railroad cars and set one of them afire with a Molotov cocktail, wrecked the company office, shot out street lights in the area, threw rocks at police cars, exploded a bomb on the plant site, and sabotaged the town's main power pole so that the town was without electricity for 18 hours. According to one witness, living in Moyie Springs was like living in a war zone. The local county sheriff, Ronald R. Smith, testified that these incidents taxed the available manpower to its limits, as officers became physically tired and emotionally drained. He had only five deputies. The city police department had six officers, but no jurisdiction in the county. Only one State highway patrolman regularly operates in the county. Sheriff Smith called the Governor's office but was referred from office to office until he finally found a State police lieutenant who offered him some help.

In May 1983 in Millville, NJ, strikers conducted a program of violence and abuse against nonstrikers that included threats that a pregnant lady "would have an abortion after 8 months, out in the middle of the street," threats with knives, bricks thrown out of moving vehicles, and glass shattered against the side and front of homes. The union published and distributed to its members a "scab list" that included the names and addresses of employees who had chosen to return to work.

In February 1983 in Fort Lauderdale, FL, union members hurled rocks, scraps, grapefruits, conduit pipes, and cinder blocks at nonunion workers who had been called to do a job on a construction site. Finally the nonunion workers were trapped in an auditorium where union men attempted to knock them over with stage curtain metal rods. A police officer standing between the two groups was hit by a 4 by 4 and ran out of the auditorium. He remained outside taking no action. The nonunion workers were finally rescued by a deal between their boss and the laborers' business agent.

In Port Huron, MI, in the summer of 1983, picketers attacked the local police, tore down the 6-foot-high fence surrounding the construction site and trapped the owner of a construction firm and seven of his employees on a roof for 5 hours. Police from five departments in the Port Huron area proved no match for the 700 to 1,000 picketers on the site. The State police, afraid to interfere remained five blocks away at an armory.

In Philadelphia, PA, during the summer of 1983 Sigmund Kaye hired a nonunion carpenter to help renovate two buildings. On August 23 a gray bus that belonged to the carpenters union appeared at the site and Kaye subsequently found 15 men tearing the inside of the building apart. When Kaye confronted them they beat, kicked and hit him about the head and face, knocked him to the ground and left him battered and bleeding. The men walked to the bus and drove off in it. As a result of this beating Kaye suffered two herniated discs and a crushed vertebra and had to undergo reconstructive surgery for his neck. The Philadelphia police department did nothing besides take the license plate number of the van. Although they confirmed that it belonged to the union, they dropped the case entirely.

Mr. President, clearly Congress needs to address the problem of union violence. Such violence is occurring at a staggering level in many parts of our country. Although many States currently have laws under which they can prosecute intrastate cases of labor violence and extortion, it is virtually impossible for them to deal with violence that is interstate in nature. As the hearings before the Committee on the Judiciary have shown, moreover, for political reasons it is often difficult to apprehend, much less convict, those who violate State antiextortion laws. In many areas local politicians and officials rely heavily on the support of unions. Knowing the immense power the unions wield, officials are often slow to respond in cases of labor violence and reluctant to utilize local law to protect the victims of intimidation. Also, in areas where unions are powerful, local residents who know of evidence and facts that would lead to the conviction of those guilty of extortion and other crimes, are too terrified to come forward and testify.

Clearly, the investigatory resources of the Federal Government should be made available to locate and protect these witnesses. With Federal jurisdiction these witnesses, if necessary, could be placed in the Federal victims and witness protection program and would be free to tell their stories without fear of reprisal. Mr. President, it is imperative that the Senate and the House of Representatives pass S. 300 and act to protect Americans from extortion and violence.●

THE OPPRESSION OF SOVIET JEWS

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I am honored to be a part of the 1985 Congressional Call to Conscience, an effort involving many of my colleagues. Today, I will add my voice to the increasingly loud chorus of protest against the oppression of Soviet Jews.

Almost 200 years ago, our Founding Fathers began the Bill of Rights with the cherished freedom of speech and freedom of religion clause. As Americans, we are privileged to be able to practice the religion of our choosing. Our Jewish sisters and brothers in the Soviet Union do not have that luxury. The Government of the Soviet Union not only suppresses the practice of any religion, it also has recently begun a virulent campaign of anti-Semitism. Those Jews who want to leave are held prisoner in a country which despises them.

The emigration numbers, once a statistic of hope, now invoke fear and frustration. Just 5 years ago, over 50,000 Soviet Jews were released from the Soviet Union. In 1980, the number of emigrants was cut in half. Last year, only 896 Soviet Jews obtained the necessary permission to pursue their freedom. Over 350,000 have begun the application process to leave. Twenty thousand are categorized as refuseniks—those who have made application to join their families and friends in Israel and have been refused. One of those is a family with whom my daughter and I had the pleasure of visiting. Their names are Naum Meiman and his wife, Inna Kitrosskaya.

Naum and his wife, Inna, first applied to leave the Soviet Union in December 1974. Just 2 months later, the Meimans became refuseniks. Naum was one of the most respected scientists in the Soviet Union. His application to emigrate was denied on the basis of Naum's knowledge of "secrets of the State." Naum refuted this assertion with a character reference from the Institute of Theoretical and Experimental Physics, his employer. The character reference certificate was signed by the Secretary of the local Communist Party branch and the director of the institute. Naum is being used as an example, a warning to deter others from applying to emigrate.

Inna Meiman was stricken with cancer 2 years ago. All efforts to allow her to leave the Soviet Union for treatment have failed. Instead, she is refused necessary treatment in the Soviet Union. During my visit with the Meimans in December 1982, I was impressed with their determination and strength. As we were leaving, Inna pulled aside my daughter, Sheila. Inna took off her locket and placed it in Sheila's hand. "I want you to have this locket, because if we disappear, I want someone to remember."

Inna's message is one which we, as American citizens concerned about freedom and human rights, must heed. We cannot rest. We cannot allow apathy to strangle us. We must remember. We must work until every person who desires freedom is released from oppression.●

NATIONAL SKIN CANCER PREVENTION AND DETECTION WEEK

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today in support of Senate Joint Resolution 4, introduced by my good friend, the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. HATCH], which would designate March 24, 1985, through March 30, 1985, as "National Skin Cancer Prevention and Detection Week."

Skin cancer is the most common cancer in the United States, accounting for 30 to 40 percent of all cancers. The incidence of this cancer continues to increase. I feel it is time that public awareness of this issue be broadened throughout our country in order to encourage and facilitate its early detection and prevention. Because over 500,000 Americans will develop some type of skin cancer this year causing 7,000 deaths, a concerted effort must be made by professional medical organizations along with Government officials to draw public attention to the causes of skin cancer and alert those individuals most at risk of developing this cancer. Only through such efforts, can the trend of doubling incidences of skin cancer every decade be reversed. It is my hope that these efforts will rid us of this national health threat sometime in the near future.

In recognition of the effort being made by health care professionals, voluntary groups, and individuals to educate and protect the citizens of this country from the threat of skin cancer, I am pleased to cosponsor this resolution. I urge my colleagues to join me.●

RURAL AMERICA FACES CREDIT CRISIS

● Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, yesterday I conducted a public meeting to receive testimony from farmers, ranchers, bankers, and the farm credit system regarding the current agricultural credit situation facing rural America. I was joined by over a dozen of our colleagues both from the House and the Senate, both Republican and Democrat, who clearly share my concern that we are confronted with a situation that demands immediate action.

There were several themes that emerged from this meeting. One is that we simply must have fast action. "Now!" Farmers and ranchers in the Southern part of our country are already facing the need to make production decisions. Farmers and ranchers in heavily agricultural States such as Iowa, Michigan, Minnesota, and my own Montana will be faced with those decisions in the next 30 to 60 days. They will have to place their orders for seed, fertilizer, diesel fuel, and all the other input supplies necessary for putting in a crop.

Without knowledge of their credit situation, they cannot arrange to have the wherewithal to plant a crop and stay in business. Without credit now, they are out of business. Several of the witnesses suggested that at least 20 percent of the farmers and ranchers will not be able to get credit. That means that 450,000 farmers and ranchers will not only be out of work but will also be faced with the loss of their homes and land, which in many cases has been in the family for generations.

The fast action necessary must have at least three elements. It must provide lower than the current interest rates of 14 to 15 percent that they must pay for farm loans. Simply to provide more credit at backbreaking interest rates will make the situation worse, not better. A person can be loaned to death. Excessively high interest rates are exactly one of the reasons why rural America is stressed already.

There must also be stretched out terms. A short term, quick fix may do some good but will also guarantee that we will be back again next year looking for another quick fix. There has to be an adequate breathing space so that farmers and ranchers can survive until the real solution—better prices—can take effect.

Fast action must also incorporate shared risk. A healthy agriculture is in the interest of us all. American consumers are beneficiaries of the lowest cost food in the world. We spend a smaller percent of our income on food than any other citizen in the history of the world.

Further, rural America is not just farmers and ranchers. Small town businesses, implement dealers, bankers, lawyers, doctors, investors in farm credit bonds, all earn a living based on what is produced on the ranches and farms. I feel that it is very significant that one of the witnesses in the hearing was a representative of the Bank of America. Clearly, a shaky farm economy has implications for us all—the great and the small.

One of the witnesses who had the most concrete and specific suggestion for helping meet the credit situation was N. Rollie Lake, president of Communicating for Agriculture in Fergus Falls, MN. Communicating for Agriculture [CA] offered what they call the CA Modified Debt Recovery Program. Basically, this proposal, which has been endorsed by all major farm organizations in Minnesota as well as both of the State banking organizations, meets all of the criteria I suggested as being necessary for a fast action program.

It would modify an agricultural loan with a private bank to a joint program of the Farmers Home Administration. It can also be used by the farm credit system as well. The Modified Debt Recovery Program utilizes the Farmers Home Administration Approved Lenders Program and Operating Loan Programs with modification that would place a maximum rate to be charged on interest. Under this proposal the maximum rate under the Approved Lenders Program would be set at 2½ percent above the discount rate. This would put the interest rate for the farmer at about 10½ percent. Further, under the FmHA operating loans, direct loans could carry under certain circumstances an interest rate as low as 7¼ percent.

The second part of this type of loan is that it is spread out over a number of years.

Under the Modified Debt Recovery Program, it would be possible to utilize the expertise of private lenders to put together a blend of loans that would provide the individual farmer or rancher with the capital needs he must have to stay in business at an interest rate his cash flow could, in fact, pay back.

To use this program, it will be necessary to have the cooperation of the Farmers Home Administration, banks, the Federal credit system, the administration, and Congress. I am certain that all of these entities share my concern that we prevent the collapse of rural America. I think the program offered by Communicating for Agriculture is innovative and can be implemented quickly. I would like to include in the RECORD at this point both the testimony of Mr. Lake and an explanation of the CA Modified Debt Recovery Program.

TESTIMONY BEFORE THE MEETING ON THE FARM CREDIT CRISIS, JANUARY 30, 1985

(Presented by N. Rollie Lake, President, Communicating for Agriculture, Inc.

Mr. Chairman, my name is Rollie Lake and I am president of Communicating for Agriculture, a nonpartisan rural membership organization with members in over 40 States.

CA is an organization working and speaking for agricultural America. We are based in Fergus Falls, Minnesota.

CA is in addition to and not in place of any other farm or rural organization. CA strives to unite and not divide agricultural America.

We appreciate the opportunity to be part of this meeting on the farm credit crisis. There is indeed a crisis in agricultural America. It is a crisis of troubled debt for the American farmer and of classified assets for agricultural lenders. It is a crisis which must and can be met.

There are a large number of farmers with substantial debt who and are in various stages of financial difficulty. For many of these farmers, economic survival is a serious question. To help this group, there must be a restructuring of farm debt.

We would like to present to you today a plan to restructure farm debt, known as the CA Modified Debt Recovery Program.

It is a program that has been endorsed by all four farm organizations in Minnesota plus both of the State banking organizations. The Minnesota Farmers Union, the Minnesota Farm Bureau, the Minnesota National Farmers Organization, and the Minnesota American Agricultural Movement have endorsed the CA Modified Debt Recovery Program as well as the Independent Bankers of Minnesota and the Minnesota Bankers Association.

There are not many issues which can command the endorsement of all the organizations that have endorsed the CA Modified Debt Recovery Program. In many ways, it can be viewed as an historic first.

The CA Modified Debt Recovery Program is a proposal to buy time. It is a proposal to make cash flow work. It is a proposal to share risk.

To accomplish this, we use the expertise of private lenders and the lending programs of the Farmers Home Administration. Both of these resources are already in place. What is needed is for them to be grought together in a modified form, that is what we have done in the CA Modified Debt Recovery Program.

The program is meant to be used for family farm operations with a reasonable chance for success. It is meant for those who can still bet the family future that their future is with farming.

The CA Modified Debt Recovery Program is designed for farm borrowers who are in financial difficulty, yet who can be helped with the right program. It is targeted to family farm operations with annual gross sales of between $40,000 to $200,000.

Today's farmers have been asked to make the transition from an economy of high inflation, rising land values, and low interest rates to an economy of low inflation, low prices, falling land values and high interest rates. There are many good farmers facing bankruptcy for the lack of a way to make this transition. These farmers, mostly full-time family farmers, were caught with too much debt at the wrong time, debt that was manageable under the prevailing economic conditions when it was incurred but became a crushing burden when conditions changed.

Today the situation is critical. All across the agricultural Midwest, and in other major agricultural areas of the country, the farm debt problem is becoming a crisis situation. State governments are wrestling with what role they can play in the current economic crisis. In Minnesota, where more than 10,000 farmers recently gathered at the State Capital, legislation is currently being considered to provide a 120-day grace period to buy time until the Federal Government brings forth a viable debt restructuring program, such as the CA Modified Debt Recovery Program. Minnesota law makers and CA accept the 120-day grace period because it will buy the necessary time to put the CA Modified Debt Recovery Program in place on a national level.

Again, I emphasize that there are many farmers who can be saved with the right debt restructuring program. We believe, as do the Minnesota farm groups and banking organizations, that the CA Modified Debt Recovery Program is that right program. It is the only program now on the table that can come close to solving the problem and handle the amount of debt restructuring necessary.

The CA Modified Debt Recovery Program utilizes the expertise of the local lenders and the lending programs of the Farmers Home Administration to achieve a significant plan for farm debt restructuring.

Attached to this testimony is a copy of the CA Modified Debt Recovery Program. Rather than take the time of the committee today to go through it in its entirety, I would like to refer to the modified credit illustrations beginning on page eight to demonstrate what the CA Modified Debt Recovery Program can do to restructure an individual's troubled farm debt.

Thank you for this opportunity to appear before you today on this most important topic and to present the CA Modified Debt Recovery Program. I would be happy to answer any questions which you may have.

FARM DEBT RESTRUCTURING, CA MODIFIED DEBT RECOVERY PROGRAM, JANUARY 28, 1985

(Prepared by Communicating for Agriculture)

CA is proposing a farm-debt restructuring plan designed to build on present programs, and target farm borrowers who are in financial difficulty yet who can be helped with the right program.[1]

Today, many farmers find themselves in a financial bind. While about 30% of farmers have little or no debt and are doing well economically, there are between 30% and 40% of all farmers who have substantial debt and are in various stages of financial difficulty.

WHO ARE THESE FARMERS IN DIFFICULTY?

Most agricultural production, about 60% in 1982, comes from 205,000 farms (out of 2.4 million total farms) with more than $150,000 in annual sales. Narrowing our focus somewhat, of these farms with sales of $40,000 to $200,000.

19% have a debt-to-asset ratio of greater than 70%. That means, for every $10 of assets, the farmer has more than $7 of debt;

44% have a debt-to-asset ratios greater than 40%;

Farms with debt-to-asset ratios greater than 40% account for 71% of debt on farms in this sales class but only 36% of assets.

For farms in all sales categories with a greater than 70% debt-to-asset ratio, there is little hope of economic survival. In a recent Iowa study, 10% of the farmers fall into this category, hold 9% of the assets and 25% of the total debt.

Farmers with debt-to-asset ratios of greater than 40% are also facing financial difficulties. In that same Iowa study, 28% of the farmers with 30% of the assets and 65% of the debt fall into that category.

The Iowa survey further shows that farmers from all sales/size categories are in the over 40% group and that the majority of these are full-time family farmers.

WHAT IS THE ANTURE OF THE FARM DEBT?

Nationally, the total farm debt has increased dramatically. In 1971, total farm debt totalled around $54 billion; in 1976, around $91 Billion; and in 1984, total farm debt stands at $215 billion.

Farmers as a group have a much higher debt to income ratio now than in the past. In 1950, the overall debt-to-income ratio stood as less than 1; in 1960, it doubled to 2, changed to over 3 in the early 1970's, to 8 in 1980 and to 10 in 1984. Today the average farmer is trying to support $10 of debt for every $1 of income.

But even more important, the nature of the debt has changed dramatically. Debt today has a much shorter maturity.

Much of the debt is short term with interest rates tied to current loan rates. Even real estate debt is based on variable interest rates or is based on realatively short contract purchases. Maturities on a great deal of real estate debt has moved from 20-25 years in the 1960's and 1970's to 10-15 years or less today.

CAN FARMERS WITH HEAVY DEBT LOADS BE SAVED?

For a substantial segment of the 30% to 40% of farmers who have substantial debt and who are in various stages of financial difficulty, economic survival is a serious question. To help this group there must be a restructuring of farm debt. This group, mostly full-time family farmers, were caught with too much debt at the wrong time, debt that was manageable under the prevailing economic conditions when it was incurred but became a crushing burden when conditions changed.

In the group of farmers, there are many good farmers facing bankruptcy for lack of a way to make the transition from an economy of high inflation, raising land values and low interest rates to one of low inflation, sinking land values and high interest rates.

Many of the farmers in this group can be helped and saved with the right debt restructuring programs.

CA'S DEBT RESTRUCTURING PROPOSAL

In order for farm debtors to pay off debt obligations, a major restructuring of indebtedness will be necessary.

The number one feature of any debt restructuring program is to stretch out principal payments into a manageable debt repayment schedule. The second major feature must provide for a lower rate of interest, and third, for farm lending to continue, the risks must be shared.

The CA proposal utilizes existing FmHA programs and expertise of commercial lenders to accomplish this.

These are the Approved Lenders Program, Insured Operating Loan Program and Limited Resource Program. CA's Debt Restructuring Plan modifies slightly these existing FmHA programs to create a program of modified recovery debt credit.

The heart of the CA debt restructuring proposal is the utilization of FmHA's Approved Lender Program, with some minor modifications.

FMHA APPROVED LENDER PROGRAM

Under FmHA's Approved Lenders Program, a qualified commercial lender is approved in advance to process FmHA Guaranteed Loans. The approved lender makes the loan, services the loan and collects the loan, thereby reducing the paperwork and time required for FmHA approval of loan guarantees. The lender is responsible for seeing that proper and adequate security is obtained and maintained. FmHA makes the final decision on farmers' eligibility, use of funds, and credit worthiness.

WHO DOES THE APPROVED LENDERS PROGRAM HELP?

In today's farm economy, there are many farmers whose debt-to-assets ratio between 40% and 70% who are caught in a "credit availability gap." These farmers are not in serious enough financial difficulty for consideration by the lender of last resort, FmHA. Yet, they do not quite meet the credit standards of private commercial lenders.

This group is a relatively stronger class of farm borrowers than normal FmHA borrowers. The problem for this class of farm borrowers is that their cash flow is inadequate under current high interest rates and low commodity prices, though their basic personal net worth and equity remains relatively strong. The security behind the loan is strong enough to satisfy the bank lender, yet the loan is classified by bank regulators as a classified loan. For the bank, every classified loan reduces the amount of available assets against which credit can be made available, resulting in less credit being available to farm borrowers.

THE FMHA LOAN GUARANTEE PROGRAM

FmHA Loan Guarantees are designed to provide the credit necessary for family farmers to conduct successful operations. The loans are to be used for the purchase of farm machinery and equipment, basic livestock, annual operating expenses and refinancing for authorized operating loan purposes. Interest rates may be fixed or variable and cannot exceed the rate common in the area. The terms of the loan may be up to seven years on basic security, Quality loans may be guaranteed up to 90% while high risk loans may receive less than a 50% guarantee.

HOW WILL THE APPROVED LENDERS PROGRAM HELP?

Utilizing FmHA's Loan Guarantee Program, the commercial lender will have the additional security to make a bankable loan to farmers who find themselves in a "credit gap". The program is not a bailout for lenders. Unless the loan meets requirements, with a reasonable chance for success FmHA will not approve it.

The program will help, first, by making credit available. Second, the banker will use the banks own (pre-FmHA approved) loan forms familiar to both the borrower and the banker, reducing FmHA's paper-handling load. Third, credit will be available on a much quicker basis, assuring that available guarantee loan funds reach eligible farmers as quickly as possible. Fourth, the banker and borrower are familiar with each other, helping to insure that better loans will be made. Fifth, the borrower is most likely to stretch out the loan payback. A commercial lender will normally have a maximum of five years on the loan while under the FmHA Loan Guarantee Program, a maximum of seven years is possible. This extra two years can assist the farm borrower in achieving an attainable cash flow-payback program.

CA'S MODIFIED DEBT RECOVERY PROGRAM

CA proposes to utilize FmHA's Approved Lenders Program and Operating Loan Programs to achieve a significant plan for farm debt restructuring. To achieve this will require some modification of each of these programs.

MODIFICATIONS TO THE APPROVED LENDERS AND DIRECT LOAN PROGRAMS

A basic modification to the Approved Lenders Program is to place a maximum rate to be charged on interest. Under the Approved Lenders Program, interest rates may not exceed the prevailing interest rate in the areas in which the loan is made. At present, this interest rate is approximately 13½%.

Under the modified Approved Lenders Program, a maximum interest rate would be set at 2½% above discount rate. This would yield an interest rate of 10½% at December 31, 1984 rates.

Clearly, there is a need to lower interest rates in order to create a more achievable positive cash flow-debt repayment plan for many farm borrowers. In addition to the obvious advantage of lower interest rates, by lowering the maximum interest rate which a commercial lender may charge under the Approved Lenders Loan Program, the result will be to create opportunities for additional farm borrowers to take advantage of the Loan Guarantee Program. A lower maximum interest rate will encourage the lender to graduate the borrower to a regular commercial status.

The second basic change in the Approved Lenders Program would be to limit the Approved Lenders guarantee to a maximum of 50%.

FMHA OPERATING LOAN PROGRAM

FmHA Operating Loans are made for both operating expenses and farm ownership. Ownership loans may carry an interest rate as low as 5½% and may be written up to 40 years. Operating loans may carry an interest rate as low as 7¼% and may be written up to 7 years. Under the Direct Loan Program, appraisals are done by the FmHA and security in the loan is named and itemized per lender.

MODIFICATIONS TO THE DIRECT LOAN PROGRAM

In order to restructure farm debt, lower interest rates and longer pay back terms will be required to attain a manageable, attainable cash flow for many farm borrowers.

The CA Modified Debt Recovery Program would incorporate into the Approved Lenders Program the use of FmHA Operating Loans in the same manner as the FmHA Guaranteed Loans. The pre-FmHA approved commercial lender would process the paperwork for FmHA Operating Loans, using the commercial lender's forms. FmHA would still have the final say-so on the loan under a shortened turn around approval or denial. Appraisals would be done by the pre-FmHA approved commercial lender or qualified appraiser. The main change in the present FmHA Direct Operating Loan Program would be to share security on a prorated dollar value basis. This last change is important to create an environment where the financial risk is shared and one which will create far fewer complications than the present system of named security.

MODIFIED CREDIT ILLUSTRATION

Under the CA Modified Debt Recovery Program, there can be a significant debt restructuring which will assist present financially troubled borrowers who have a stronger asset base yet who can neither qualify for FmHA loans or regular commercial lender loans.

Principal reduction	$9,714	$10,476
Interest payment	10,350	8,875
Total	$20,064	$19,351
Cash flow balance	$936	$1,649

From the above example, the Modified Debt Recovery Program has accomplished a significant reduction in interest rates and has extended payments over a longer period of time to achieve a reasonable and achievable cash flow.

The Modified Debt Recovery Program covers the three areas of need: restructuring of debt, adjustment of interest and sharing of risk. The Modified Debt Recovery Program shares the risk by bringing the Government in on a maximum of 50% guarantee of the Approved Lender Program. Debt is restructured by adding the Direct Lending Program, and interest is lowered with a combination of ability through the Direct Lending Program to lower to a minimum of 7¼% and a maximum of 2½% plus Discount Rate on the Approved Lender portion. The Modified Debt Recovery Program utilizes the assets of the FmHA, the types of funds which are already available and adds the expertise of Commercial Lenders. The Modified Debt Recovery Program would only be in place long enough to carry agriculture through this present period of adjustment.

LEGAL PROTECTION FOR WHISTLEBLOWERS

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, today I am introducing the whistleblower's bill with my distinguished colleagues, Senators HEFLIN and GRASSLEY. This bill provides protection for those workers in the Government who display honesty and forthrightness in uncovering waste and abuse in their workplaces.

In these times of imperative deficit reduction, we must assume the responsibility of eliminating the $1,000 coffeepot. Too often the whistleblower is subjected to harassment or dismissal merely for exposing abuse. This bill encourages Federal employees to come forward without fear of reprisal.

The bill allows the Special Counsel to seek Federal court redress. Currently, the Office of Special Counsel is limited in its authority. K. William O'Connor, the Special Counsel, has stated that whistleblowers should not expose waste because he does not have the power to protect their rights.

Yesterday, a record trade deficit was announced. We cannot afford to allow this bill to be overlooked.●

KIM DAE JUNG

● Mr. HARKIN. Mr. President, on Tuesday, I attended a luncheon honoring Kim Dae Jung. Mr. Kim is regarded by many as the most important voice for democracy in South Korea. I believe that Kim Dae Jung's return to South Korea is an opportunity to move that country toward democratic values that we in the United States value so highly.

Clearly, with the great ties that we have with South Korea, many in the Congress are closely watching to see how Kim Dae Jung will be treated when he arrives. We are hoping that he will have the chance to fully and openly participate in South Korea's political processes.

Mr. President, I request that the remarks I gave at the luncheon be printed in the RECORD.

The remarks follow:

I am pleased to join the Center for International Policy and the North American Coalition for Human Rights in Korea in this testimonial luncheon for Kim Dae Jung. Both organizations are in the forefront of the movement to bring about democracy and human rights in Korea, and it is indeed fitting that they should convene this gathering of American friends of South Korea and the leaders of human rights organizations in connection with his decision to return to his homeland to participate there directly again in the restoration of democracy.

Let me briefly touch on the grave injustices done this brave man:

In 1971 he was deprived of the Presidency of his country by a fraudulent national election, the last Presidential election in that country with more than one candidate.

In 1973 Mr. Kim was kidnapped by the KCIA while on a visit to Japan. The names of the kidnappers are known to both the Japanese police and the South Korean authorities. Yet they are still free in South Korea ever since Mr. Kim has been persecuted.

Between 1973 and 1980 Kim was tried on two separate occasions for speaking out against President Pak Chong-Hee, he was imprisoned and subsequently released under house arrest.

In 1980 Mr. Kim was again tried—this time essentially on charges of sedition—charges which our State Department termed "far fetched." He was sentenced to death after a trial which several international legal groups decried as a mockery of due process of law.

In 1981 the death sentence was commuted to life in prison, and in 1982 this sentence was reduced to 20 years as part of a deal between our two Governments in order to pave the way for South Korean President General Chun Doo-Hwan to visit the United States.

In December 1982 Mr. Kim was exiled to the United States "for medical reasons."

During the past year Mr. Kim has been a Fellow at the center for international affairs at Harvard. Mr. Kim has now announced his intention to return home. The South Korean Government responded both in Seoul and Washington by stating that if he returns, Mr. Kim will be reimprisoned. Seoul now appears to be backing away, as they realize their intention to jail Kim could complicate the South Korean President's projected visit to Washington in April.

The bizarre events that have befallen Mr. Kim are enough to boggle the mind. Indeed for the past 15 years Mr. Kim has been persecuted for his political beliefs as have few other advocates of democracy. He stands here today in the tradition of other great leaders of human dignity—Mahatma Gandhi, Martin Luther King, Benigno Aquino, Raul Alfonsin of Argentina, Bishop Tutu of South Africa, and Archbishop Oscar Romero of El Salvador.

Kim's views on democracy have been decried by his enemies as insignificant. In fact, Kim is the disciple of our own Thomas Jefferson, and strangely enough his belief in Jeffersonian democracy was among the incredible charges brought against him during his infamous trials. If Kim's role were insignificant, why then has the South Korean Government gone to such lengths to obstruct his return home?

The fact is that Kim is regarded by most political analysts of Korea, and this obviously includes those in the South Korean Government itself, as the most important voice for democracy in South Korea, and the leading critic of that Government's repressive rule.

South Korea is an important ally of the United States. We have spent our blood and treasure in its defense. And we are currently committed by treaty to defend freedom in South Korea. We have spent billions in economic and military assistance, and we have supported its cause internationally—in the United Nations, the specialized agencies, and the international financial institutions. It is important to the United States that South Korea become a viable democratic country, just as it is important to us that it maintain a free economy.

The defense of Korea from aggression can best be accomplished if Korea establishes an open society and Americans can identify with the Korean people's democratic aspirations. How can Americans be asked to sacrifice for a Government which essentially is undemocratic? Surely we have not forgotten all the lessons of Vietnam. Certainly then our national security and human rights in South Korea are interrelated as in every other country.

In the past, our State Department has publicly characterized Mr. Kim as a "respected political leader" and a "friend of the United States." It knows that the charges against him are fraudulent and politically inspired by enemies of democracy. Yet today, the State Department is showing great restraint in supporting his right to return home and to participate in the political process. Limiting our support for Kim to a limp hope that his return will be "trouble free" is not enough.

Mr. Kim is a political leader who is worthy of all-out American support. We should in both quiet diplomacy as well as public posture be saying loud and clear that our future relations with Korea will hang largely on how he is treated in South Korea. He believes in the same democratic values we do, and he represents the aspirations of millions of South Koreans for democratic government. He is entitled to a more forceful defense of his political liberties and rights than he is receiving.

I am pleased to join with others in this room and throughout our country in this expression of solidarity with his cause and his noble crusade for human dignity. We ask only that his safety be assured and that his civil and political rights be restored so that he can participate freely again in the political affairs in his country. We have faith that the Korean public will make the right choice as to his political future as they have before in other instances when granted the opportunity to express themselves freely for democratic government.●

THE U.S. TRADE DEFICIT

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, the United States has earned the inglorious title of being the world's largest debtor nation. The Commerce Department announced that the U.S. trade deficit is higher today than at any other time in history.

Twenty years ago, the United States exported 11 percent of all goods produced and imported a mere 8 percent of goods consumed here. Today, we export over a quarter of all products we produce and import almost one-third of the products we consume.

These figures are not meaningless. They reflect the loss of millions of U.S. job opportunities and billions of dollars in lost output. Sustained trade deficits promise to gravely impair the economic health of U.S. industries.

The Reagan administration's budget policies have produced enormous budget deficits and high interest rates which have had disastrous results on U.S. trade. These large budget deficits have attracted foreign investors to the United States like magnets. The influx of foreign capital into the United States helps shore up the exchange value of the dollar. The result is an overvalued dollar and an economy quite dependent on the decisions of foreign investors.

We cannot continue to ignore this existing trade pattern. Our domestic laws and international rules no longer respond to the unfair trade practices that currently place barriers on U.S. trade. My colleagues, I trust, are well aware of my support of a free market economy. Our trade policy, however, should provide the opportunity for the United States to compete equally in world markets. At no other point in history has it been more critical than now to strengthen the open and free trading system. We must continue to advance the economic interests of the United States in the world trade market.

The time is long overdue for the development of a coherent international policy. The administration has failed to recognize the severe impact these enormous trade deficits have on the U.S. economy. In 1981, the trade deficit was $40 billion. Today, it is a staggering $130 billion. Yet we have seen little direction by the administration in the form of a policy change.

I applaud the efforts of my dear friend, Senator BENTSEN, whose persistence and knowledge has led the Senate to confront the problems of our trade deficit. I look forward to working with him in the coming months.●

FREEZE DEFENSE SPENDING

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, reducing the size of the Federal deficit must be the most important task we confront in the coming weeks. The American people are prepared to make the sacrifices necessary to help us achieve this objective.

However, unless we freeze defense spending, there will be a total breakdown in our ability to convince the American people that our deficit reduction package is either fair or sensible. We will never reach agreement on spending cuts of the magnitude we need without including defense in an across-the-board freeze, and no freeze will ever be enacted without defense bearing its share. The American people see that as fair, and I think they are pretty much on the mark.

Mr. President, this Nation is strong and secure enough to freeze defense spending. Most of the arguments I have heard against a freeze of Defense Department budget authority are either based on misinformation or greed. More simply, this Senator takes strong exception with recent statements which indicate that a freeze will either jeopardize our national security or inhibit our ability to negotiate meaningful arms reductions with the Soviet Union.

The facts, Mr. President, are exactly the opposite from what many who oppose the defense freeze assert; unless we seek deep cuts in DOD budget authority, we will ultimately erode the readiness of our Armed Forces.

Consider that between fiscal year 1980 and 1985, DOD budget authority increased by $150 billion. Every major program requested by the administration has been accommodated. Procurement has grown by over 100 percent from $48 billion to $97 billion. More important than this dramatic increase in the so-called investment accounts is the fact that we may not be able to pay for all these weapons. In fact, last January the Congressional Budget Office estimated that at some point in the future we will have to find an additional $100 billion to pay for all the weapons contracts DOD has signed. In short, the defense budget is out of control. By 1989 CBO has estimated that outlays from prior years appropriations will comprise 42 percent of defense outlays.

The consequences of such mismanaged overspending are obvious. Unless we get defense spending under control, we will end up robbing readiness and operations and maintenance accounts to pay for bloated procurements bills when they come due. Ultimately, unless we pull the reigns in on defense procurement, we will find ourselves compromising our conventional capabilities.

This is why our strategy with regard to the defense budget must be to freeze budget authority rather than outlays. We must avoid falling into the trap of seeking deep outlay savings in 1986 which can only come from our readiness and personnel accounts.

A Defense Budget freeze would give the Defense Department about $30 billion less in budget authority than the Pentagon is asking for in fiscal year 1986 and would ensure that the procurement accounts are affected. Such a strategy would realize that amount of outlay savings over several years, not all at once. Most importantly, this approach would mean that savings would not have to be directed at quick spending accounts—fuel savings, military pay, steaming hours or flying hours—all of which provide near-term outlay savings but negatively impact our main defense objective: military readiness. Rather, a freeze in defense spending budget authority at fiscal year 1985 levels would require DOD to establish priorities, eliminate redundant procurement, and either cancel weapons programs or stretch them out. Such an approach makes sense from the perspective of sound management, and makes sense for the national security of this Nation.

Now, Mr. President, let me take a moment to assess the impact of a freeze on defense spending on our ability to negotiate an arms control agreement with the Soviet Union. The fact is that the Soviet Union has returned to the negotiating table in part because President Reagan in concert with the Congress has embarked upon a program to significantly increase the capability and credibility of our strategic forces.

Consider that the area of largest growth in the defense budget has been in strategic forces. From fiscal years 1981–84, the portion of the defense budget allocated to strategic forces has experienced average annual real growth of 27 percent compared to 8.5 percent for general purpose forces and 9 percent for the defense budget as a whole.

This 27-percent figure does not take into account the 15.5-percent average annual real growth in the Department of Energy nuclear weapons budget, or the substantial amounts of money in R&D for the weapons life of the B–1 or the MX, or dollars allocated for either the strategic defense initiative or theater nuclear forces.

The Senate has thus far ratified actions which will lead to the eventual deployment of: 100 MX missiles; a new single-warhead small ICBM in the early 1990's; by the late 1980's, 100 B–1 bombers and by the early 1990's, 132 advanced technology or Stealth bombers; deployment by 1988 of about 400 nuclear-armed sea-launched cruise missiles on some attack submarines and surface ships; and continued procurement through 1993 of Trident submarines at the current rate of 1 per year to a total of 20 and the deployment on most Trident submarines by 1996 of the new D–5 missile.

Mr. President, the cost of these efforts has been estimated by the Congressional Budget Office to be $50 billion a year in budget authority and $250 billion over the fiscal year 1984–88 time period to build, operate, and modify these strategic forces.

Now, we can disagree about the priorities established by the Defense Department. Certainly, I for one am very concerned that we have emphasized the modernization of our strategic forces at the expense of our conventional readiness. But the fact remains that a freeze on defense spending, in light of the level of modernization already undertaken, will not erode our long-term strategic capability.

A freeze in defense spending only means that we must establish realistic priorities in the way we spend our defense dollars. It means that we may have to slow down our procurement. It means ending outright programs of marginal utility. It does not necessarily mean that we must cancel programs which are vital to our national security, but it does mean that we must be honest in our assessment of what is or is not important.

Let's take an example. The conventional wisdom is that the $1.4 billion we are spending in fiscal year 1985 on the technologies associated with the strategic defense initiative brought the Soviets back to the negotiating table. It is my understanding that the administration will propose to increase SDI research by $2.4 billion to a total of $3.8 billion for fiscal year 1986. Should we be expected to believe that our ability to negotiate with the Soviets will be impaired if we allow SDI research to grow, but at a more reasonable rate? Would a $2 billion program—still a 40-percent increase—create any less leverage with the Soviets than a $3.8 billion program in light of President Reagan's will to proceed to find and create a strategic defense capability? I think not.

Mr. President, the strategic defense initiative is just one example of how a more modest level of effort can be achieved under a budget freeze without jeopardizing our long-term national security interests. Many more programs can be adjusted in a similar manner—if there is a will to do it.

Let me close by saying that this Senator and the American people want a strong national defense. The best way to maintain consensus for a strong national defense and avoid the apathy which affected defense spending in the 1970's is to ensure that DOD is the equal partner in any deficit reduction scheme which expects significant sacrifices from the American people. Failure to address the deficit will sap the economic vitality, the lifeblood that allows us to make and keep our defense and foreign policy commitments. In the final analysis, our national security is dependent upon our economic strength and health.●

REVENUE SHARING—S. 318

● Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I rise today to express my strong support for S. 318, a bill introduced by Senator HEINZ to reauthorize the General Revenue Sharing Program through 1991, and I ask unanimous consent that I be added as a cosponsor.

I believe Congress has a compelling responsibility to take substantive action to reduce the incredible deficit which our Nation currently faces. However, this program, which we are supporting at fiscal year 1985 levels, should not be allowed to expire. On the contrary, funding for this program has remained constant since 1976. The reauthorization bill continues the present $4.6 billion annual program. It is, therefore, a glowing example of a Federal program which has both served its purpose well and has done so without budget increase for almost 10 years.

As a former Governor, I have seen first hand the efficiency and worth of this program to local governments. It provides money for many essential services, such as law enforcement, fire protection, community development, and transit projects, just to name a few. The key characteristic, and overwhelming justification, for the continuation of revenue sharing stems from the fact that local governments are able to use the funds to meet their unique needs without the customary bureaucratic redtape with which taxpayers have grown so tired and frustrated.

Mr. President, taxpayers across the country are demanding accountability. This program provides that much-deserved accountability by returning to the citizens the power to have some direct say in the allocation of their tax dollars. In doing so, Congress is telling our constituents that we care about their needs as they preceive them. After all, it is clear to me they know much better than Congress or the administration what services they need the most.

General revenue sharing is a program that has met and exceeded expectations. It is a program to assist hardworking citizens across this country in obtaining services which benefit individuals and enrich communities.

Finally, Mr. President, general revenue sharing returns taxpayer dollars to taxpayers. I can think of nothing more appropriate.

I hope we can act on this important measure in the very near future, and I urge my other colleagues to join in this effort.●

COSPONSORSHIP OF SENATE RESOLUTION 53 AGAINST RETROACTIVITY OF MAJOR TAX REFORM

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today as a cosponsor of legislation, Senate Resolution 53, introduced by my friend from Connecticut, Senator DODD, to put the Senate on record that major tax reform should be effective only upon enactment and that transition rules should be incorporated into any tax reform legislation to cover prior transactions.

Everyone knows that tax reform is in the air. The Treasury Department has proposed its version of a modified flat tax. Many leading Democrats and Republicans in the Congress have also proposed their own tax reform proposals. While the fate of tax reform legislation is uncertain, the impact of the Treasury proposal has been awesome.

Economic transactions that would be impacted by tax reform have been halted in place. This is because taxpayers have no idea whether tax reform will be enacted and in what form. This freeze in economic activity is bad for the economy.

Senate Resolution 53 will be a notice to the market and Treasury that any future tax reform will not leave the Senate with a retroactive effective date. Senate Resolution 53 will put the Senate on record protecting transactions, like the purchase of a home, from the provisions of major tax reform.

Mr. President, I urge the Senate to quickly adopt Senate Resolution 53 as part of any move to reform the Tax Code.●

RUBEN BURKS

● Mr. RIEGLE. I rise today to pay tribute to Ruben Burks, a man whose works have been integral to the growth of the UAW into an international organization. He is a tremendous community leader who has contributed countless hours to many organizations in Flint, MI.

Since his arrival in Flint, Ruben Burks has been active in union matters, as well as community affairs. His first job was in the Fishery Body Plant No. 2, where he became involved with local 598 of the union, serving in a number of capacities ranging from alternate committeeman to a member of the executive board. At the same time, he was a major force on the education, fair practice, and recreation committee.

For 6 years he served as secretary-treasurer of the UAW General Motors Sub Council, No. 2, which represented 11 Fisher Body plants. He then moved up to the region 1-C staff, and became international representative for Fisher Body locals, Chevrolet locals, and for the membership in the independent parts and supplier plants. Two years ago, Ruben was appointed assistant director of UAW region 1-C.

While he has devoted great amounts of time and energy to his UAW responsibilities, Ruben Burks always reserved a part of himself for the community. He has been involved with many organizations, too numerous to list in their entirety. They range from the United Way to the Special Olympics, to the Goodwill, the Boy Scouts, and many others, all indicative of his commitment to make Flint a better place to live.

Ruben Burks' accomplishments as a loyal public servant and concerned community leader are an inspiration to us all. For 30 years, his efforts have helped to form the UAW into a proud and successful institution. I salute Ruben Burks, as does the UAW and the city of Flint for his valuable contributions.●

GRADUATE MEDICAL EDUCATION: A PROPOSAL FOR REFORM

● Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, it is my intention to work toward a reform of the system of Federal funding for graduate medical education. I believe that this reform is necessary both for reasons of policy—to make the educational system more responsive to the Nation's health needs—and as a matter of fiscal prudence. I have outlined my basic approach below and will welcome comments and suggestions as I move toward turning this proposal into specific legislative form.

Graduate medical education [GME] is the generic term for the clinical training that interns and residents receive in the various specialties and subspecialties of medicine. This training is an integral and necessary component of the education of the physician in preparation for clinical practice. At the present time, the majority of States require at least 1 year of graduate medical education for licensure to practice medicine.

Graduate medical education is conducted in the Nation's teaching hospitals. Most GME programs are conducted in the over 400 hospitals that hold membership in the Association of American Medical Colleges' Council of Teaching Hospitals. GME programs vary in length depending upon the nature of the specialty training, but generally range between 3 years, for general internal medicine and pediatrics, and 7 years, for thoracic surgery and other surgical subspecialties.

GME programs have always operated on the premise that the patient care and educational components of the clinical training experience are completely interwoven and thus all program costs should be accepted as a part of the cost of providing patient care. This principle was accepted at the time that the Medicare Program was established in 1965. For the past 20 years, Medicare has paid from the hospital insurance trust fund the costs associated with GME programs. Indeed, until recently, all third-party payers have paid their proportional share of the costs associated with these programs. However, during this time, payers have exercised no influence over the number of training positions, the amount of the stipend associated with each position, or the distribution of positions among the various medical specialties. At the present time, therefore, there is "open-ended" funding for GME programs. Each hospital can determine if it wants to establish GME programs, the kind of specialty training it wants to offer, and the number of positions to offer without any consideration of the costs involved.

The impending insolvency of the Medicare hospital trust fund and concern with escalating health care costs in general have focused attention on the appropriateness of the educational costs incurred by the teaching hospitals. Indeed, the 1982 Social Security Advisory Council recommended that the Medicare Program discontinue paying educational costs from the hospital trust fund. However, the Council recognized that simply defunding GME programs would result in a severe disruption in the system of medical education that exists in this country and thus recommended that Medicare continue to pay these costs until an alternate source of funds could be identified. Along similar lines, the inspector general of the Department of Health and Human Services has recommended that the Medicare hospital trust fund should pay for only the first year of clinical training. According to this recommendation, residents would support themselves in subsequent years by billing patients for the services provided.

I do not believe that either of these approaches are practical if we wish to maintain a system of high quality graduate medical education for the training of physicians in this country. I believe that it would be inappropriate to divorce the funding of GME programs from the revenue that hospitals receive for providing patient care services. Accordingly, I believe that Medicare should continue to pay its fair share of the costs of appropriate graduate medical education programs. In my view the issue, then, is not whether Medicare will continue to pay GME costs, but whether Medicare will continue to pay in an "open-ended" fashion regardless of the appropriateness of the GME system that exists in this country at the present time. In this context, the focus of the debate shifts from a concern with financing mechanisms to a concern with physician manpower issues.

Since publication of the Report of the Graduate Medical Education National Advisory Council in 1980, attention has focused increasingly on the excess supply and geographic and specialty maldistribution of physicians in our society. As a result, there is a growing consensus that a larger percentage of medical school graduates should be trained in the primary care specialties, rather than the medical and surgical subspecialties. In this context, the Federal Government has attempted during the past decade to promote primary care training, using several different approaches with little success. Presently, the Public Health Service provides grants to help fund primary care GME programs. However, the amount of money distributed by these grants is inadequate to affect significantly the distribution of GME positions among the various specialties.

While I believe that it is appropriate for the Medicare Program and, incidentially, other payers to continue to pay the cost of GME programs, I believe that Medicare should pay only when it can be documented that institutions have responded in a responsible fashion to important societal issues regarding the number and specialty distribution of physicians.

There are three general principles which should be considered in any legislative proposal which would link Medicare support for GME programs with institutional compliance with national guidelines reflecting sensitivity to physician manpower issues. These principles are:

First, there should be an opportunity for every graduate of an LCME-approved U.S. medical school to compete successfully for a position in an approved and funded GME program. Since GME training is required for licensure in almost all States, we must be certain that every qualified graduate has the opportunity to compete for the training necessary to complete his or her medical education. Recognizing the concerns about an oversupply of practicing physicians and the need to constrain Medicare expenditures, it is important that the number of first-year training positions offered throughout the country approximate the number of graduates of U.S. LCME-approved medical schools.

Second, there is no requirement that each graduate be able to receive training in the specialty of his or her choice. At the present, there is intense competition across the country for positions in the various specialties and in the various teaching hospitals. This is desirable. Individuals who choose to enter medical school must recognize from the outset that society does have a legitimate interest in the specialty distribution of physicians practicing in this country and that the individual may have to accommodate to society's needs when competing for GME training.

Third, education and patient care are completely interwoven in GME programs. Thus, it is essential that the educational component of an institution's GME program must meet uniform standards of quality if the institution is to be eligible for Medicare funds for its GME programs. These standards should be developed by appropriate private sector bodies and applied in a critical fashion when evaluating individual programs. Furthermore, since medical education, in a larger sense, is the responsibility of our Nation's medical schools, each teaching hospital must have an appropriate affiliation agreement with a U.S. medical school that will further attest to the quality of the institution's GME programs. A hospital must not be able to justify maintaining a GME program simply and solely on the basis of the patient care services provided by the physicians in training.

Within the context of these general principles, there are three specific steps which should be taken to address the specific manpower issues.

First: A larger percentage of graduate physicians should enter training in the primary care specialties of internal medicine, pediatrics, family medicine, and obstetrics/gynecology. In order to be eligible for Medicare funds to support GME programs, the majority of positions offered by a single hospital or a group of hospitals sharing an affiliation agreement with a U.S. medical school must be in the primary care specialties. I do not favor allocating positions by specialty because there is useful and desirable variation in the capability and capacity of the teaching hospitals to provide specific forms of training. I would simply require that some majority of all positions, for instance 70 percent, should be allocated to the primary care specialties and the balance to the nonprimary care specialties, without any concern for the distribution of those positions among the various specialties and subspecialties in each major category. All positions funded by patient care generated revenues, including hospital and physician charges, would be counted in determining compliance with the distribution formula. I believe that a private sector body, similar to the Graduate Medical Education National Advisory Council, should be charged with monitoring physician manpower data and making recommendations on the percentage of positions to be allocated to primary care training. These recommendations should be made every 5 years and become operative only after an appropriate time has expired to allow institutions to make adjustments in their GME programs, probably 2 years.

Second: In view of the projections that there will be a substantial excess of physicians in this country by the end of the decade, it does not seem appropriate for Medicare to continue to provide funds in an open-ended fashion for GME training for graduates of foreign medical schools who, by virtue of the training they receive, become eligible to establish practices in this country. Clearly, highly qualified graduates of foreign medical schools should have the opportunity to compete with graduates of U.S. medical schools for GME positions. In order to encourage true competition for positions, Medicare should pay educational costs only when at least 75 percent of trainees in a GME program are graduates of an LCME-approved U.S. medical school.

Third: In order to assure nationwide compliance with these manpower criteria, it is essential that responsibility for coordinating GME programs be vested with institutions that are in the position to negotiate with teaching hospitals to reallocate positions in their GME programs. I believe that undergraduate and graduate medical education should be better coordinated and that this responsibility should be placed upon the Nation's medical schools. The medical schools already have substantial influence over the teaching hospitals by virtue of supplying graduate physicians to fill GME positions and by maintaining a degree of supervision and control over the clinical faculty teaching in GME programs. By requiring each teaching hospital that wishes to be eligible for Medicare funds for GME to have an affiliation agreement with a medical school, the school will be appropriately armed to negotiate with each institution to alter its GME programs. Similarly, this arrangement will provide an incentive for the school to take the leadership in seeking out new sites for primary care training to accommodate the additional students that will be required to enter primary care GME programs. I believe that it will be to the mutual benefit of the medical schools and the affiliated teaching hospitals to work in a cooperative manner to achieve the appropriate distribution of positions required by this proposal.

In summary, I believe that attention to these principles should allow us to develop a consensus around which a legislative proposal can take shape which will result in a more rational system of GME in this country. Although I have focused my comments on the manpower sensitive issues, I would like to add that I believe that a proposal based on these principles will result in cost savings for the Federal Government. First, it seems likely that the number of GME positions will decrease under such a proposal. Second, I believe that it is desirable to impose a cap on the stipend the Medicare will pay for each GME position. Finally, if appropriate attention is paid to the need to shift GME positions from nonprimary care to primary care specialties, it should be possible to discontinue the Public Health Service grants which promote primary care training since they will no longer be needed for this purpose.●

TRIBUTE TO PRENTICE WITHERSPOON, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED FOOD & COMMERCIAL WORKERS UNION, LOCAL 328, AFL-CIO

● Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate a dear friend on his many years of devoted service not only to his union and its membership but also to many other Rhode Islanders. Prentice N. "Red" Witherspoon, retired this month after 8 years as the president of the United Food & Commercial Workers Union, Local 328 in Providence, RI, and decades of outstanding service to organized labor and the entire Rhode Island community.

Red has been involved in the retail food industry in a great many capacities since 1946. In 1951, he led the first major organizing campaign to unionize the United Public Markets, now Star Markets, in an effort to obtain better wages and working conditions for its employees. Several years later, in 1957, Red accepted a full-time organizing position with Local 328 of the United Food & Commercial Workers Union. From 1957 until 1977 Red served as shop steward, organizer, press correspondent, recording secretary, vice president, legislative agent, safety coordinator and business representative for Local 328. Since January he has served as president of Local 328.

In addition to serving the membership of Local 328 of the UFCW, Red served the citizens of Rhode Island in many ways. He has been chairman of the Public Relations Committee for the Twin Valley, Boy Scouts of America; a member of the Budget Committee for the Catholic Charity Fund, chairman of the Rhode Island AFL-CIO Community Service Committee, vice president and executive committee member of the United Way of Southeastern New England, a member of the parish council for St. Mary's in Crompton, and a member of the Rhode Island Consumers Council. He is a former member of the board of trustees for Rhode Island Historical Society and a former member of the State of Rhode Island Board of Regents for Education. Additionally, Red continues to serve the people of Rhode Island as a member of the board of governors for higher education, as chairman of the Consumer Relations Committee for the RI Group Health Association, as vice president of the Rhode Island Institute for Labor Studies and as corporate secretary and member of the executive committee of the Rhode Island Group Health Association.

As anyone can conclude from the description of this man's activities he is as dedicated as he is energetic in his service to his membership as well as to his community. Red has been a dear personal friend for a great many years. He is a rare individual who always impressed me with his broad imagination and his never ending range of solutions to the difficulties confronting his membership, his fellow workers and his fellow citizens. I particularly appreciate his support of the concept of codetermination, or concept I have pursued for a number of years.

I extend to him my congratulations on his outstanding contributions to the labor movement and to the entire Rhode Island community, and I extend to Red and his family my very best wishes for the future.●

EXTENSION OF TRADE ADJUSTMENT ASSISTANCE PROGRAM NEEDED THIS YEAR

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, one of the most cogent editorials I have seen on trade policy recently appeared in the New York Times on January 14 discussing trade adjustment assistance—the Government program assisting workers and firms adversely affected by imports.

Any growing economy requires change, and any economic change is going to produce victims—workers and firms in industries that have lost their competitive edges. While I might disagree with the Times as to which industries are in that category—as opposed to victims of unfair and illegal foreign trade practices—we are in accord that such victims exist and that addressing the problem is a legitimate policy question for Government.

It is a practical question as well, for as the editorial notes, and as I have stated in this Chamber on numerous occasions in the past, if Government does not respond to this problem with a viable adjustment assistance program, the import-impacted workers and firms will have nowhere to go but the Congress and nothing to ask for but protection. And they are likely to get it.

Adjustment assistance is the fair price of a free trade policy. The program needs renewal and expansion before its expiration on September 30. This editorial reminds us of both the fairness of the price and the expense of the alternative. I ask that the editorial be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The editorial follows:

[From the New York Times, Jan. 14, 1985]

EVEN OUT THE FREE TRADE PAIN

Why should sweater makers in Hong Kong be permitted to drive New York City garment workers to the unemployment lines? Why should Chile's nationally owned copper company be allowed to force mines in Arizona out of business? Why must steelworkers in Gary have to compete with those in South Korea who make $2 an hour?

There's a good answer to all such questions: Open markets are vital to America's economic interests. But undeniably, free trade creates losers as well as winners. And those who understand the value of free trade have a political—and moral—duty to try spreading the pain more equitably.

Open markets serve America in tangible ways. Unfettered trade gives consumers access to a greater variety of products at lower prices. Trade forces domestic industries to adjust to changing technology before they become hopelessly inefficient. Perhaps most important, trade is the primary source of hope for the world's poor, increasing their stake in a stable world order.

But the advantages of open trade apply to the economy. Americans are better off if they can buy winter vegetables from Mexico at lower prices, but unemployed farm workers in Florida aren't. Tax collectors and grocers and shoe store owners in the crumbling mill towns of western Pennsylvania have no reason to rejoice over the cheap, high-quality steel coming from Brazil.

To try sharing out the sacrifice, the Government started the trade adjustment assistance program in the 1960's. A few hundred million dollars was spent each year on retraining and extra unemployment benefits for workers displaced by imports. But the program never had a constituency. Unions, seeing it only as an alternative to protected, high-paying jobs, labeled it "burial insurance." Liberals saw no reason to favor a relatively small group of workers over worse-off victims of racism or hard-core poverty. So there was little resistance when the Administration last year lobbied to kill the assistance program as a way to cut spending.

True, the $20-a-hour auto workers who refuse to take big pay cuts to preserve their jobs don't need assistance as desperately as ghetto teen-agers who can't read. True, the trade adjustment money wasn't spent effectively. But it still makes sense, practically and philosophically, to pay politically powerful workers to end their opposition to import competition. Consider the steel industry. According to Robert Crandall, an economist at the Brookings Institution, it costs $100,000 a year in higher prices to protect a single steelworker's job.

Nor is it necessarily beyond the capacity of government to provide limited, well-targeted aid to ease the transition for businesses, workers and communities. Such aid might include training and relocation allowances for younger workers, speeded-up pensions for older workers, subsidized loans for companies and cash grants for affected communities. Assistance would be linked to specific cost-cutting concessions from labor and suppliers and to a gradual reduction of productive capacity. Japan, for example, has managed just such a program for its aluminum industry.

Industry by industry, the battle to maintain open markets is being lost. With nothing else to offer constituents victimized by rapidly changing trade patterns, elected officials succumb to protection. If the drift continues, if Washington continues to deny the possibility of general interest solutions to special interest problems, the economic cost will be enormous.●

GEN. EDWARD ALLEN PARTAIN

● Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, today Gen. Edward Allen Partain will turn over the command of the 5th U.S. Army and retire after over 35 years in the U.S. armed services.

We in Arkansas, especially those citizens and friends in his hometown of Paragould, are proud of the contributions General Partain has made during his years of service.

A graduate of the U.S. Military Academy, he has risen through the ranks until he received appointment as lieutenant general on January 19, 1983.

During his distinguished career, General Partain has received the Silver Star, Legion of Merit, Distinguished Flying Cross, Bronze Star Medal with Oak Leaf Cluster, Air Medals, Army Commendation Medal with V Device and three Oak Leaf Clusters, Purple Heart with two Oak Leaf Clusters, Combat Infantryman Badge, Master Parachutist Badge, and the Army Aviator Badge.

As an Arkansan and an American, I thought it most appropriate to pay tribute to him today and thank him for his loyal service to our Nation.●

THE EAST LYME HIGH SCHOOL MARCHING BAND

● Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I wish to take this opportunity to recognize the East Lyme Viking Marching Band from East Lyme, CT. These 173 high school musicians, through various fund raisers, subsidized their own trip to Washington to march in celebration of the inauguration. The Vikings have performed around the world representing not only East Lyme, CT, but the United States as well. They have an impressive list of honors and awards. They are repeated winners of numerous statewide and regional competitions such as the Barnum Festival, the Groton marching competition and the Woonsocket marching competition. The East Lyme Marching Band is widely recognized as one of the best bands in the State and they are the pride of their parents, the town of East Lyme and indeed all of Connecticut.

While it was a bitter disappointment for all involved, I want the band members to realize what a great honor it is to have been chosen to represent Connecticut on such a prestigious occasion. This has been a memorable experience for all these fine musicians. I would like to extend my admiration and gratitude to the dedicated parents, fans and supporters, as well as each and every band member. Thanks to:

FEDERAL OIL AND GAS LEASING ACT OF 1985

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I am introducing a bill today that I have introduced three times in the last 5 years. It is popularly known as the competitive leasing bill and it is designed to eliminate what I think is one of the most egregious, outrageous practices that continues unabated in the management of this country's public lands.

Every Senator, with the exception of those who have just come to the Senate, has heard me make this speech no less than a half-dozen times. But I must emphasize again that Government leasing policies for oil and gas on onshore lands not only violate the criminal laws of this country, but are an absolute betrayal of the American people.

I have never been more shocked than I was in 1979 to find that the U.S. Government had leased 33,000 acres of the choicest natural gas lands that in Arkansas on a first-come first-serve basis for $1 an acre. I was shocked by the blatancy of it, but I was even more shocked having come from the Governor's office of the State of Arkansas because our State laws demand that every single act of the State—every lease, every purchase—be done on a competitive basis. But I found that an anachronistic practice which is a carryover of the 1920's still exists in our Federal leasing policies.

I cannot really believe that there ever was much justification for the system, but if there was, it has long since terminated.

Let me explain the three ways that you can lease onshore lands from the Federal Government. But first I might point out that 548 million acres of land that belongs to the United States is subject to this kind of leasing.

One, any person can go to the Bureau of Land Management in the Department of the Interior and say, "There is a 2,000-acre tract of land" or whatever size tract of land they have found in some State, we will say in Wyoming, "and I would like to lease that land for $1 an acre."

The Bureau of Land Management then says, if that land is not over a "known geological structure," which is referred to as a KGS, "you can have it."

That is what happened to 33,000 acres of land down at Fort Chaffee, AR, 2 miles from my home.

Fort Chaffee is surrounded by roughly 500 producing gas wells, and the only reason the 74,500 acres at Fort Chaffee had never been leased is because for many years the law prohibited the leasing of military reservations for oil and gas exploration.

But in 1976, we amended the law to make military reservations subject to lease. The Texas Oil & Gas Co. immediately went to the Bureau of Land Management and said, "We picked out 33,000 acres down at Fort Chaffee we want to lease."

The Bureau of Land Management said, "You go down to Tulsa, OK, and get the U.S. Geological Survey to sign this piece of paper that this land is not over a known geological structure and you can have it."

A gentleman from Texas Oil & Gas took off for Tulsa, spent 2 hours there, came back the next day, wrote the Bureau of Land Management a check for $33,000 and left with a lease for 33,000 acres that was worth $100 million.

And we talk about cutting waste, fraud, and abuse in government.

We talk about all the things we are going to do to bring deficit spending under control and yet we continue to allow a policy like this to continue.

Well, Mr. President, that story has a happy ending. It has two happy endings.

When I discovered that the BLM had leased this 33,000 acres for $1 an acre, I asked Senator BOREN of Oklahoma to hold a hearing so that we could find out what was going on. He did, and I must say the U.S. Geological Survey, an agency for which I had a great respect, acquitted themselves in a very poor manner in that hearing.

USGS could not explain what a known geological structure was. No wonder the BLM could not put it up for competitive bids. They could not tell you what a known geological structure was. There was no such thing. You would have had to have oil spouting out of the ground in the middle of the lease for the BLM to put the land up for lease on a competitive basis.

But because of those hearings and because I was squealing like a pig under a gate, a year later the BLM leased another 24,000 acres in Fort Chaffee. But this time they put it up for competitive bids and the land brought nearly $1,300 an acre, or $43 million. Later I got a bill passed to return half of that money to the State. The only reason a bill was necessary to do that was because of an oversight when Congress opened military reservation to leasing. I had to get a special bill passed in order for Arkansas to get what other States had been getting all along for oil and gas leases on Federal lands.

The Interior Department canceled those leases, but the second happy ending is that the Texas Oil & Gas Co. appealed the cancellation of those leases. Without belaboring the long trial, 2 weeks ago the Supreme Court affirmed the district court and a court of appeals decision which said that the leases should never have been granted noncompetitively to Texas Oil & Gas and, therefore, that that 33,000 acres is now free to be leased again.

Now is not the best time in the world to lease for natural gas because gas and oil are both a glut on the market right now. But in any event, that 33,000 acres will eventually be put up competitively, and instead of the U.S. Government and the State of Arkansas getting $1 an acre, those leases could bring as much as $5,000 an acre, or as much as $100 million. I daresay it will not bring less than $50 million.

The second way lands are leased by the Bureau of Land Management is that you send them $75 and they will put your name in a lottery. Once every 2 months they will whirl the squirrel cage and pull out a name. If you happen to be the winner, you get the tract of land under consideration for $1 an acre. By the way, none of that $75 you pay to get your name put in the squirrel cage goes to the States. The States only get half of the $1 an acre paid for the lease.

Out in Wyoming in August 1983, the BLM put up for lease several thousand acres of land in 18 separate tracts by lottery.

The people who happened to get their names pulled out of the squirrel cage got, for example, 500 acres of land for $500, or $1 an acre.

I want to point out to you that this land that was being let was in the Ames Draw region in Wyoming and within eyeshot of the biggest oil find in the United States in the past 5 years—12 of the 18 happy winners sold their winnings for $50 million to $100 million within 6 weeks.

The Government, counting the $75 entry fee, plus the $1 an acre, received, I think, just over $1 million. Just 12 of the 18 winners sold those leases for at least $50 million. You should also bear in mind that most of the winners would not know an oil derrick if they saw one. These are people in Fort Lauderdale, they are people in Wyoming, they are people from all over the country who are shooting craps, just like they would in Las Vegas. The lottery players do not want to develop those leases. They want to win something that is worth of lot of money. In that one lottery drawing in Wyoming, the Government got only $1 million for what was worth $100 million.

The third way we lease lands occurs if the Bureau of Land Management determines that a particular tract to be leased is over a known geological structure. It then must be leased competitively.

Mr. President, do you know how much land leased in this country is leased competitively? We lease around 12 million acres a year, and only 2.7 million is let competitively; 97.3 percent of it goes for $1 an acre.

If I had done that while I was Governor, I would be in jail.

Mr. President, I have been objecting to this for 6 years, and the truth of the matter is that those who favor this system, and who benefit from it, have successfully defeated me every time I brought it up on the floor.

Last year I went door to door and I talked to Senators. I thought I had 51 votes. Unhappily, I did not get a chance to offer it except on the continuing resolution and it was admittedly legislation on an appropriation bill. The Senate was not in the mood to vote for proposals like this on a continuing resolution. I understand that.

But should we continue this egregious policy of leasing noncompetitively the public resources of this Nation which belong to everybody—not 100 Senators, not 435 House Members? Those resources belong to the public.

We go home and make speeches galore and say, "I will treat your money just like I treat my own. I am a fiscal conservative. I promise we will not spend a dime we do not have to. I will be a good guardian of your money."

When Secretary Clark was nominated to be Secretary of the Interior, I asked him, "Don't you own about 800 acres in California?" Yes; he did.

I said, "Do you have it leased for oil and gas exploration?" Yes; he did.

"What did you get for it?" He did not know.

I like Judge Clark. It is hard for me to believe that a man who owns 800 acres of land and leases it for oil and gas does not know what he got for the lease.

Anyway, I said, "Did you get $1 an acre?" He said he got more than that.

I said, "Did you get $10? He said, "I don't know."

I said, "How far are you from an oil and gas well?" He said, "Thirty-five miles."

The Department of Interior would probably pay you to take land 35 miles away from oil and gas wells. They would not charge you $1 an acre.

I said to judge Clark, "You would not sell your land for $1 an acre, would you?" He said no, he would not.

I said, "How in the name of all that is good and holy do you justify this noncompetitive leasing policy which they call the simultaneous leasing system?"

They ought to call it the simultaneous bilk-the-public policy. How anybody can defend that is beyond me. I have never heard one argument that made one scintilla of sense in defending this outrageous system.

Some people think Arkansas is a backward State. Incidentally, I will tell you it is not very backward. We are growing. People are coming from all over the country to live in Arkansas. So many retirees are moving to my State that we are second only to Florida in the percentage of our people over 65 years of age.

I might say when I was Governor my policy never was to see how many people I could stack in that State. I did not think that was particularly good policy. But they were welcome to come.

Anyway, getting back to the point, in Arkansas we have enough sense not to let our lands be leased for $1 an acre; 49 other States now, including Wyoming, which was the last holdout, have the same policy. You cannot lease lands for less than they will bring in competitive bids.

In Arkansas, 2 years ago, the Forest Service turned over to the Bureau of Land Management 2,000 acres to lease for oil and gas exploration. The State of Arkansas just happened to have 80 acres right in the middle of that tract. That was just for the mineral rights. The State did not even own the surface. The State decided to lease those 80 acres of mineral rights.

Of course, you understand the Bureau of Land Management was giving theirs away for $1 an acre. That was cut and dried. But the State of Arkansas put its 80 acres up on a competitive basis and got $107 an acre for 80 mineral acres. We got four times more money for the 80 mineral acres than the Government got for the 2,000 acres that surrounded it.

There is not an acre of land anywhere around any Corps of Engineers lake in Arkansas that brings less than $150 an acre in bonus bids for oil and gas leases. The Bureau of Land Management is continuing to lease the lands around our Corps of Engineers lakes, our national forests, and everything else it can get its hands on for $1 an acre, not only cheating the Federal Treasury, but also cheating the people of Arkansas, who are entitled to half of it.

You will hear a lot of muttering and mumbling around here when I bring this issue up and we begin to debate it. But it is indefensible. There is no justification for it.

Ask anybody on the streets of Washington, DC; Little Rock, AR; or anyplace else: "Do you think the Government ought to be leasing its lands for $1 an acre?" They will demand you take a saliva test. Yet we do it.

Why do we do it? I do not want to implicate any of my colleagues who vote consistently to continue this policy. They get up and say, "Well, little independent operators, mom and pop operators, would not get any land to develop if it were not for this policy."

Is that right? The Bureau of Land Management says that on that 3 percent of the lands we do put up competitively, independent operators get 82 percent of the leases. Of the land that the State of Wyoming owns and puts up on a competitive basis, independents get 80 to 90 percent of the leases. So where is the support for the argument about the mom and pop operators?

Do you know the other argument for this system? The oil companies and the little mom and pop operators and the independents hardly bother to send their $75 in to participate in the lottery directly. Do you know why? There is no point in them putting their names in a hundred times and spending $7,500 to get a shot at winning a lottery when they can go buy it from a little old retiree down in Fort Lauderdale for half that.

The system has always been rife with fraud. The BLM just puts band-aid after band-aid on it but the fraud keeps popping up. The U.S. attorney out in Colorado told me when I first got into this that he had to put extra chairs in his office to take care of the plea bargainers that were coming in during one investigation. People were submitting to the lottery the names of dead people, friends' names, and fictitious names.

A good friend from Arkansas told me that a fellow walked into his office one day and said, "I won this Federal lottery lease. I put my name in there a hundred times on behalf of this oil company." The company then came to him and said, "Well, now, you have won this lease. We are ready to pay you for your trouble." He said, "You know, I think I will just keep this one." They said, "Well, now, just a minute; that's not the way the game is played. "Yeah," he said, "I think I will just keep this one and sell it myself."

Well, there was nothing the company could do about it. The company offered him $42,000 for the lease. But within 6 weeks this fellow had sold his lease for over $100,000 and made himself independently wealthy.

There is just no end to the abuses in this system. ABC and NBC have done segment after segment on it. "20/20" did a segment on this. Everybody talks about it, but the Congress does nothing.

Mr. President, I am not ashamed to tell you we need the money in my State. We are looking forward to that Chaffee lease being let again competitively and bringing in $50 to $100 million because the State is going to get half of the money.

Do you know what the CBO says about this? It said in 1952 that over the next 5 years we could increase revenues by $700 million by leasing all lands competitively.

Mr. President, my bill essentially tracks the leasing policies of the Outer Continental Shelf leasing. I have asked why we should lease onshore lands under a different policy than the one we use offshore. The answer has been that it is because this one is the one on the books and you cannot get it off.

My bill is extremely fair. It simply provides that if two or more people nominate a tract, it will immediately be put up for competitive bids. If only one person nominates it and nobody else indicates interest, he can nominate it again on the second round and, if he is still the only one interested, it will be put up for bids. If that person is the only one who offers a bid, he gets the lease. Who can be hurt by that?

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 373

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SEC. 1. This Act may be cited as the "Federal Oil and Gas Leasing Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. Subsections (a) through (e) of section 17 of the Act entitled "An Act to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, oil shale, gas, and sodium on the public domain", approved February 25, 1920 (30 U.S.C. 226 (a) through (e)), are amended to read as follows and subection 17(f) and following are relettered accordingly:

"SEC. 17. (a) The Secretary may lease onshore Federal lands for oil and gas development by competitive bidding only. Competitive bidding shall be on the basis of those bidding systems set forth in section 8(a)(1) of the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act, as amended (43 U.S.C. 1337), which the Secretary determines would maximize competition.

"(d) The Secretary shall issue a lease to the highest responsible qualified bidder for each tract offered at a lease sale.

"(e) No lease issued under this section shall be for a tract exceeding five thousand one hundred and twenty acres, unless the Secretary finds that a larger area is necessary to comprise a reasonable economic unit.

"(f) Each lease that the Secretary issues under this section shall be for an initial period of five years and so long thereafter as oil or gas is produced in paying quantities or drilling or well reworking operations as approved by the Secretary are conducted thereon. A lessee may apply to extend the initial term for an additional period or periods not to exceed a total of five years. Each extension application shall include an exploration plan for the extended term. The Secretary, in his discretion, may extend the initial term only if he finds that because of adverse technical, environmental or economic conditions which are beyond the control of the lessee, the lessee cannot adequately explore the lease during the initial five year term or any extended term. Nothing in this subsection shall be construed as affecting existing leases.

"(g) All leases issued under this section shall be conditioned upon payment be the lessee of a rental of not less than $2 per each acre of the lease. Each year's lease rental shall be paid in advance. A minimum royalty of $4 per acre in lieu of rental shall be payable at the expiration of each lease year beginning on or after a discovery of oil or gas in paying quantities on the lands leased.".

SEC. 3. Action taken by the Secretary pursuant to the bidding, nomination, and lease procedures of subsections (a), (b), and (c) of section 17 of the Act of February 25, 1920 (U.S.C. 226 (a) through (c)), shall not be considered "major Federal actions" for purposes of implementing section 102 of the National Environmental Policy Act. Nothing in this subsection shall be construed as affecting the application of section 102 of that Act to the issuance of a lease under section 17.

SEC. 4. Section 30(a) of the Act of February 25, 1920 (30 U.S.C. 187a) is amended by striking the third sentence and inserting in lieu thereof "The Secretary shall disapprove the assignment or sublease only for lack of qualification of the assignee or sublessee or for lack of sufficient bond: Provided, however, That the Secretary may, in his discretion, disapprove an assignment (1) of a separate zone or deposit under any lease, (2) of less than six hundred and forty acres, or (3) containing an overriding royalty which exceeds limitations established by regulations.".

SEC. 5. The Secretary shall prescribe such rules and regulations, or amendment to existing rules and regulations, as may be necessary to reflect the amendment made by this Act within one hundred and eighty days after the date of enactment of this Act.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a letter dated April 16, 1984, to Mary L. Walker of the Department of the Interior from Christopher DeMuth of the Office of Management and Budget be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OFFICE OF MANAGEMENT AND BUDGET,
Washington, DC, April 16, 1984.

MARY L. WALKER,
Deputy Solicitor,
Department of Interior, Washington, DC.

DEAR MS. WALKER: Last October the Bureau of Land Management suspended Simultaneous Oil and Gas (SOG) leasing in response to reports of abuse in the program, and on March 15, 1984, the Bureau proposed regulatory changes to improve the program (49 Federal Register p. 9752). Prior to issuance of this proposal, OMB staff met with several Bureau officials to discuss alternative leasing systems and program reforms developed since October. We were impressed by the scope of alternatives considered, the thoroughness of the analysis, and the clear articulation of evaluation criteria.

We believe, however, that the alternative proposed in the March notice—advance payment of the first year's lease rental—falls short of the reforms needed in this program, and is inferior to other approaches according to the Department's evaluation criteria. In our view, a straightforward competitive offer leasing system would be by far the best cure for the deficiencies of the existing SOG program. The rental offer system (in which lands are offered initially at a very high rent, then reoffered at progressively lower rents) also appears to offer substantial advantages over the advance rental proposal.

The primary goal of the noncompetitive oil and gas leasing programs is to promote discovery and production of hydrocarbon resources by assigning leases, quickly and efficiently, to those who are willing and able to explore and develop them. Both a competitive offer system and a rental offer system would accomplish this, without having to rely on the secondary assignment market to correct the inherently arbitrary nature of the lease awards in the current SOG system. This is the approach set forth in the Regulatory Policy Guidelines issued by the Presidential Task Force on Regulatory Relief last summer (Reagan Administration Regulatory Achievements, Presidential Task Force on Regulatory Relief, August 11, 1983, pp. 43-45).

A secondary goal of the noncompetitive program is to recover for the taxpayer the maximum practicable share of fair market value for leased resources. The proposed advance rental system is particularly poor at achieving this goal. Compared to the existing SOG system, federal revenues [1] would decline by between $17 and $37 million per year, while state revenues would remain unchanged. A rental offer system, on the other hand, could increase federal revenues by $13 million and state revenues by $108 million per year. We expect that a competitive offer system would do at least as well as a rental offer system. Overall, the current SOG program recovers between one-third and one-half of the market value of the leased lands. Alternative systems can do far better than this.

A third goal, and the motivation for this rulemaking, is to assure that leasing systems for federal lands are designed to minimize fraud and abuse. The SOG program is susceptible to fraud and abuse, as the events of the past year have demonstrated. While the proposed advance rental system might alleviate these problems somewhat, a substantial risk would remain. In contrast, a competitive offer system is highly resistant to abuse. While collusion in bidding is always a possibility, it would be extremely difficult in a market with as many potential bidders as the onshore oil and gas market. Similarly a rental offer system would be far less vulnerable to fraud and abuse than the SOG system.

Finally, ease of administration is an important concern in evaluating alternative leasing systems. In the case of a competitive offer system, the chief administrative consideration would be whether a prior determination of fair market value was needed before conducting a sale. Even without a fair market value determination, however, we believe competitive leasing would outperform the SOG system. A rental offer system would be something of a novelty, but we see no major administrative obstacles to overcome.

We believe now is the opportune time to make thorough reforms in the noncompetitive oil and gas leasing program that would cure the current program's underlying problems as well as its symptoms. We urge you to reconsider the options that would assign leases directly to persons interested in developing them and that would recover more of their value for federal and state taxpayers. My staff is available to assist you in any way we can.

Sincerely,

CHRISTOPHER DEMUTH,
Administrator for Information and Regulatory Affairs.

[1] These figures are based on the Department's own analysis of the performance of alternative leasing options. We have not reviewed all the assumptions underlying this anslysis, but the trends appear approximately correct. OMB would be happy to work with DOI staff to refine these revenue estimates.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask that the Senate now proceed to the nomination of Richard G. Darman, to be Deputy Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, there is no objection to proceeding to the nominations referred to under "New Reports."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nominations will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read the nomination of Richard G. Darman, of Virginia, to be Deputy Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, on Tuesday, January 29, the Finance Committee favorably reported the nomination of Richard G. Darman to be Deputy Secretary of the Treasury. The vote was unanimous.

Dick Darman will bring a wealth of experience to his new job at Treasury. Mr. Darman served in senior policy positions in five cabinet offices from 1970 to 1977. Just prior to joining the White House staff, he was a member of the faculty of Harvard's Graduate School of Government and, at the same time, was a partner in a Washington-based economic and management consulting company.

By virtue of his impressive public service, private sector experience and academic background, Dick Darman is well qualified for the position at Treasury.

I offer my strong recommendation for the approval, by the Senate, of Mr. Darman's nomination.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise to express my support for two nominees who were unanimously approved by the Committee on Finance earlier this week.

Richard Darman, who has been nominated for the position of Deputy Secretary of the Treasury and Ronald Pearlman, nominated to be an Assistant Secretary of the Treasury for Tax Policy, are ably qualified for the positions they will fill.

Mr. Darman has had valuable experience working with the policy issues that a high ranking Cabinet official must face. He has worked as an Assistant Secretary of Commerce and, more recently, as a close adviser to the President on legislative issues. His past experiences as a member of the Harvard faculty and as a distinguished member of the business community are but two of an impressive list of qualifications.

Mr. Pearlman has also demonstrated his qualifications for the position he will be assuming. As Acting Assistant Secretary for Tax Policy, Mr. Pearlman has had actual experience in the duties of the important section of the Treasury Department which he has been nominated to head. In addition, Mr. Pearlman can continue to draw upon his experiences as a tax lawyer and professor of law at the Washington University School of Law in St. Louis, MO as the new Assistant Secretary.

The confirmation of both men, when coupled with the installation of James Baker as Secretary of the Treasury, should provide that Department the solid management necessary to aid the President and Congress in the current efforts to reduce the deficit and institute a simpler and fairer Federal income tax system.

I urge my colleagues to unanimously approve these capable nominees.

NOMINATIONS OF RICHARD G. DARMAN TO BE DEPUTY SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY AND RONALD A. PEARLMAN TO BE ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY FOR TAX POLICY

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I am glad that we have been able to follow the expedited schedule for floor consideration—and, I am sure, approval—of two outstanding nominations to the Treasury Department. We have completed Senate action on the nomination of Jim Baker to become Secretary of the Treasury. With the two nominations now before us the new Treasury team will be off and running. They need to be, because there is a lot to be done.

Ron Pearlman is to become Assistant Secretary of the Treasury for Tax Policy. Ron, of course, has been acting in that post since last August, and it is good that we are finally getting around to make his position official. The members of the Finance Committee have worked closely with Ron Pearlman since 1983, on tax legislation and on regulatory matters that have come up in the tax area. I am sure my colleagues in the Senate share my belief that Ron will be a strong and effective advocate for the Treasury in the upcoming tax reform debate. He is someone we trust and know we can work with.

Not only has Ron Pearlman demonstrated his skill in tax policy at the Treasury, he has complied a distinguished record as a member of the tax bar in St. Louis and a professor of tax law at Washington University. I hope we approve Mr. Pearlman's nomination without delay.

RICHARD DARMAN

Mr. President, Richard Darman has been the very able assistant to the President who, among many other responsibilities, was instrumental in putting forth the President's tax and budget program and securing congressional approval for the "Reagan revolution" in economic policy.

Dick Darman is not just a behind-the-scenes policymaker and strategist: He made an excellent record as Assistant Secretary for Commerce under President Ford, and he has had considerable experience in both the public and private sectors with issues of economic policy and international legal questions—A background that should serve him very well indeed in his new post. I hope we will approve both these nominations without delay.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is considered and confirmed.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the nomination was confirmed.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be immediately notified of the confirmation of this nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now turn to the nomination of Ronald Alan Pearlman, to be an Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nomination will be stated.

DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY

The assistant legislative clerk read the nomination of Ronald Alan Pearlman, of Missouri, to be an Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, by submitting Ronald Pearlman's nomination to be the Assistant Secretary for Tax Policy, the President has asked the Senate to confirm a man who already has been serving in a significant tax capacity at the Treasury Department.

Since Mr. Pearlman has been Deputy Assistant Secretary for Tax Policy during the past 2 years, he is well known to me and the other Finance Committee members.

Mr. Pearlman has had a distinguished career both in Government, at Treasury and the IRS, as well as in the private sector as an associate and then partner in a St. Louis law firm.

He is extremely knowledgeable in tax law and is well qualified for the position to which he has been nominated.

I hope the Senate will agree that Mr. Pearlman should be confirmed in an expeditious fashion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is considered and confirmed.
